The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Symbols

THERE is, so it seems to me, no better test of a writer's mind and art than his treatment of a traditional story. A legend proves by its very persistence the fact that it has a fundamental significance; it challenges the author who employs it to interpret an eternal symbol in terms of the thought of his time, and the meaning which he is able to give to it is the measure of his soul. In the hands of a great man Faust or King Arthur, Tristram or Helen takes on a new vitality and a new grandeur. The greatness of the racial imagination which created them is recognized; but they are, as it were, given a local habitation in the particular world of thoughts and ideas in which the artist lives. Thus, Faust, without ceasing to be Faust, became Marlowe's symbol of his age's thirst for power and Goethe's symbol of his own aspirations toward transcendental knowledge.

In the hands of a small man, on the contrary, all symbols become small, and the substance of Rostand's "The Last Night of Don Juan" (Greenwich Village Theater) is the most conclusive proof of the feebleness of the author's imagination; for he never [illegible] the meaning of the legend and he leaves the hero smaller than he found him. In [illegible] all his plays, he is, it is true, free enough with the grandiose gesture; he sets his first scene at the mouth of hell where his blustering Don wins a [illegible] and he does not hesitate to bring the devil himself, along with the ghosts of a score of the Don's victims, upon the stage; but here as always the intellect or the passion which would make the grandiose grand is lamentably lacking and his heroes and villains, for all their mouthing and their strutting, bring no exaltation to the soul and strike no terror to the heart. In his hands the sinister but resplendent figure who has fascinated the imagination of the world for more than four centuries shrinks into insignificance and becomes merely the feeble exponent of a commonplace moral. For the first time in the long history of his many transformations Don Juan denies his essential nature. Libertinage, he confesses, doesn't pay; and when Rostand makes his hero say that he is not interpreting a symbol but rather destroying it—for if Don Juan is anything at all he is the projection of a fundamental protest against conventional morality, the imaginative embodiment of an ideal unrecognized in the acknowledged codes of the people who have loved him—that hero simply ceases to exist.

Now, any genuine artist must recognize this protest as the essence of Don Juan's meaning, though he may interpret it as he will. He may make the Don, as the early and pious chroniclers of his deeds made him, simply a type of that rebellious Nature which is the antithesis of God; he may, as apparently Mozart did, see in him the triumph of the gay over the solemn; and he may even, like Bernard Shaw, make of him one of those Devil's Disciples whose rebellion against respectability is only the beginning of a search for morality; for all of these are possible meanings of the protest which gave him birth. But no real artist can sweep the Don away with a gesture of that conventional morality the very inadequacy of which can be the only possible reason for the persistence of the legend in the hearts of generation after generation. To attempt to do so is merely to prove that one is incapable of grasping the meaning of the legend which one presumes to use, and so it is that Rostand's repentant Don Juan has no life because he has no function, while the real Don Juan will continue to live as long as there exists among men and women any rebellion which he can typify.

Even the actors who play in the present production seem to have realized too late this chilling, for though their playing is, like the play, vociferously declamatory it is singularly lacking in feeling or emphasis, and they mouth their lines with little attention to the inflection for which the meaning would seem to call. Strikingly in contrast with this flashy pièce de résistance is Vildrac's charming little incident, "The Pilgrimage," which is given as a curtain raiser. Though Vildrac's sentiment is somehow a little out of accord with the mood of the moment it is a genuine and beautiful thing, as those who have seen "The Steamship Tenacity" and "Michel Auclaire" know. Augustin Duncan, who is an unimpressive Devil in the Rostand piece, has opportunity to give a very moving characterization in "The Pilgrimage."

The "Charlot Revue" (Selwyn Theater) promises to repeat its success of former years. Though it is, by the standard of American revues, far from lavish, it includes four performers, Beatrice Lillie, Gertrude Lawrence, Jack Buchanan, and Herbert Mundin, of very unusual ability, and thanks to them it is, perhaps, the most continuously amusing entertainment of its sort now to be seen. Some of the skits are bright, some a little thin, but they are all carried along admirably by the verve of the principal performers. In "Naughty Cinderella" (Lyceum Theater) Avery Hopwood has adapted from the French an excellent farcical vehicle for Irene Bordoni. It is funny, spirited, and very innocently naughty.

The current production at the Provincetown Theater illustrates the difficulty facing those interested in experimenting with a new stagecraft, the difficulty being that it is apparently impossible to find plays written in the required form that are worth producing. Some of the settings in "Adam Solitaire," especially that of the bridge scene, are eerie and beautiful, but the play is desperate nonsense.

"The City Chap" (Liberty Theater) is a musical comedy based on "The Fortune Hunter" and made amusing by the acting of Richard Gallagher.

Italy's Despotism

By JAMES MURPHY

I. Local Tyranny in Italy

ON October 31 Benito Mussolini deposited the ultimate straw on the back of the Roman camel. He appointed Filippo Cremonesi Governor of Rome.

Who is Cremonesi? Soon after the Fascists came into power Mussolini scrapped the whole municipal outfit in Rome and appointed one of his own accomplices as civic dictator, officially styled "royal commissar," to take the place of the mayor and aldermanic council. Filippo Cremonesi is the name of the commissar thus appointed. True to the principles of Fascism, he was endowed with full power to clear the last cent from the pocket of the plebs and spend it in whatever direction seemed good to him, without incurring the liability of eventually having to show the receipt. Beyond this, Mussolini accorded him credit from the state Treasury, so that there should be no limit to the orgy of municipal spending that has gone on in Rome for the past two years and a half. The atmosphere of the orgy has been so mephitic that even Fascist noses have twitched. And this accounts for the strange fact that the manacled press was accorded sufficient liberty to declare that on the first big deal put through under the commissariat regime—that for the repaving of the principal streets—the black camorra cleaned up something in the neighborhood of $350,000. This is a tremendous sum for a town like Rome, which is not one-eighth the size of New York in point of population and much poorer financially than the average British or American provincial town of the same size. Since the commissar gained control of affairs all contracts have been given out privately, generally to friends, who have remarketed them. And thus the scandals piled up—the financing of houses for government employees, selling and reselling of municipal property, laying down of new trolley routes, and so on and so on. Pilgrims to Rome during the Holy Year must have stood agape at the saturnalia of municipal spending that met the eye. The American and British taxpayers must have asked themselves how it was that these people could not afford to pay something off their international debt when they could do themselves so superhandsomely at home.

A law has now been made whereby the last municipal rights of the Eternal City are definitely abolished. For the future the capital of Italy is to be what is called a "governorship," to be ruled by a governor with dictatorial powers, assisted by two vice-governors, ten rectors, and an advisory council, all to be appointed without any reference to the wishes or votes of the people. Rome sinks thus to the level of a crown colony wherein the natives are not considered as sufficiently civilized to be intrusted with the management of their own affairs. The appointment of Cremonesi is a hint of how affairs are to be managed.

A curious anomaly, in the inrush of Fascist anomalies whereby Italy is being inundated every day, is that the new plan of municipal reform places Rome on the same level as the small municipalities which have a population of not more than 5,000. Except for Rome, the recent legislation does not touch the municipalities that have a population of over 5,000. These will continue to be governed by an elected council and a mayor, or syndic, chosen from the councilors. But all municipalities that have only 5,000 inhabitants or less are henceforward deprived of all civic rights. They must return to the medieval system of the podesta, in other words, to the absolute sway of a local dictator appointed by the Premier. The podesta will have all power in his hands. He will be like the chief of an African tribe and he will be Mussolini's henchman. Technically he will be appointed by the government through the machinery of a royal decree; but that is only camouflage. A law is being passed to make the Italian premier responsible only to the king, and no longer to the parliament. The cabinet ministers are no longer to share responsibility for their respective administrations. As the king is only a figurehead, the premier becomes absolute potentate. Therefore all appointments by the central government are at the whim and wish of the premier.

This strangle-hold on municipal freedom seems inconceivable to the average outsider. What is its meaning and how is it possible that it can be tolerated in the land of Garibaldi and Mazzini?

The peculiar conditions of municipal government in Italy have no counterpart elsewhere. In Italy there are no rural districts, in the statutory sense. Every acre of the country, whether bog or mountain or snow-capped Alpine peak or the burning lips of Vesuvius and Etna, is part of a municipality. The national territory is divided into practically 9,200 sections—I think the exact number is 9,186. These sections are called municipalities. The majority of them are not towns but merely administrative sections of national territory on which there may be anything from five scattered dwellings to large centers like Rome and Milan. The important point is that each municipality, whether a mere circumscribed patch of mountain or a great city, has fundamentally the same civic status as any other. Each is a municipality and each has its syndic, or mayor, all mayors having the same statutory positions. So that the mayor of a community having only one hundred inhabitants is as much of a mayor as the syndic of Rome.

This grouping is not merely haphazard in its origin, as ours is, but is a state administrative division. The municipality is the ultimate pivot on which the state rests and operates. Practically all the state services reach the citizen through the agency of the municipality. It is the latter that collects all taxes of inland revenue, arranges for the calling up of conscripts, takes an inventory of all taxable property, grants all sorts of licenses, and exercises general supervision on behalf of the state. This condition of affairs will be better grasped if it be remembered that most of the Italian municipalities have a history that stretches back to the Middle Ages, when they were self-contained civic units in the midst of the political anarchy of the time. They were incorporated as such in the modern state; so that they form, as it were, a general commonwealth, each municipality retaining a large share of its old political autonomy, or autarchy as it is technically called, in the administrative sense. In other words, the municipality is a state within the state; and this is so true that an Italian municipality actually issues passports to its inhabitants for the purpose of facilitating their journey to a neighboring municipality.

Go into the typical palazzo communale, or town hall, any day you wish and you will find the populace streaming to and fro to register their belongings, cattle, sheep, pigs, horses, mules, pianos, billiard tables, on each of which there is a tax assessed and paid at the commune. So that the communal official is practically the incarnation of the state as far as the ordinary citizen is concerned. Therefore, it is clear that whoever has charge of municipal administration is in practical control of the country. He can make life impossible for the natives if they do not conform in his bidding and the non-conformist loses not only him the vote in order to escape annoyance. The new law lays it down that all municipalities of only 5,000 inhabitants or less must henceforth be governed by a podesta, appointed by headquarters. The number of such municipalities amounts to 7,500. This accounts for almost exactly 40 per cent of the whole Italian population. By a few strokes of the pen the Fascists have assured themselves of 40 per cent of the national vote at any parliamentary elections.

The Fascists already hold a majority of the remaining municipalities. According to Italian law the central government can dissolve a municipal council when it wishes and appoint a royal commissar to reign ad interim. In the case of nearly two thousand municipalities the Mussolini Government has already availed itself of this loophole in the constitution; so that when the new decree operates the number of municipalities left with mayors and municipal councils will be easy to count.

One of the immediate purposes of thus securing dictatorial control of the municipalities is the facilitation of Fascism's shady finance. It is well known that a favorite trick practiced since Mussolini got control of things is to falsify the state budget by transferring state expenses to the municipal budgets. All the municipal budgets show a deficit; but this does not appear in public. And there will be no chance of its coming into the light now when there will be no local supervisors appointed by the people. The system will be understood if we imagine all the municipalities as subordinate corporations grouped under the one parent corporation, which is the state. The balance sheets of the subordinate corporations are being thrown more and more into a state of insolvency in order to make the parent balance sheet look healthy. Yet the solvency of the parent corporation is solely dependent on the solvency of all the subordinated corporations taken together.

American financiers who have visited Italy have been too simple-minded to spot this trick. They have also been too simple-minded to ask for the treasury accounts and collate them with the budget. And so the Fascist financial bluff has gone ahead triumphantly. Mussolini wants to show the unwary Yankee how splendidly everything is going in Italy, so that he can raise loans in the United States. We need not ask into what pockets the money is to go. John Bull was not so easily taken in when Minister De Stefani went to London to talk business.

How do the people of the rank and file envisage the new curtailment of their local autonomies? In reality they look on it as a change from a greater to a lesser evil. At the present moment the municipalities are governed by a system of violence and intimidation practiced by the local Fascio, the head of which is technically called a ras, which is the euphonious term for a protected rowdy. He dominates the community and the police are afraid of him. The people think that the new podesta will be, in the greater number of cases, an ex-army man and may have a sense of discipline. He may turn out to be a tyrant; but anyhow he will be a responsible tyrant and he may restore the morale of the local police.

This also is undoubtedly one of the purposes in the mind of the cabinet group that framed the law. This is the nationalist group, headed by Federzoni. The nationalists are hoping one day to snatch power from the Fascists. They made a bold bid for it last December, when Federzoni tried to bring about the resignation of Mussolini on the occasion of the publication of the Rossi memorandum. Now they are going to work more slowly but more surely. As the nationalists are strongly backed by the army chiefs and as they hope that the podesta to be appointed to 7,500 communes will be an ex-army man, in the majority of cases, they think that he will be able to oust the local Fascist potentate and so change the local sway of the dagger and cudgel for the sway of a military absolutism, which is the ideal of government according to the political doctrines of Federzoni's intransigent nationalists.

II. Fascism on the March

> The revolution is on the march. I am silent; but my plans are well laid and I shall not be turned aside from them by any confusionary talk. When a certain point will have been reached one deed will strike the multitude dumb and it will be a revolutionary act which will complete the revolution and bring it to its inexorable goal.

THUS spake Benito Mussolini in the course of an interview granted for publication in the current issue of a Fascist periodical entitled Ordine Fascista. We are given no inkling as to what will be the nature of this new revolutionary deed which will strike the multitude dumb (troncherà il brusio). Will it be the murder of the Pope and the looting of the Vatican? Or will it be the burning of Rome, with Mussolini playing his fiddle on the dome of St. Peter's, from which the cross will have been torn down and the lictor's ax placed in its stead, as was threatened by Mussolini himself in his own paper, Il Popolo d'Italia, on the occasion of the founding of Fascism?

It is useless to attempt an answer to these questions. The retrospective value of the Dictator's pronunciamento is of more pressing interest. "The revolution is on the march," he said—and he said that immediately after the Florentine atrocities had taken place. Nothing else was in the public mind at the time. The Florentine shambles were undoubtedly an integral part of Mussolini's plan. We must allow him the merit of being outspoken in his acknowledgment of responsibility. This acknowledgment is also backed up by reliable information from independent sources. It was Mussolini himself who ordered the dogs of war to be unleashed at Florence. And it was Mussolini who ordered the cessation of hostilities. These statements are corroborated in a solemn document recently published in Paris by the Italian section of the Ligue des Droits de l'Homme. "The responsibility for this atrocious crime," the document affirms, "must not be confined to the wretched apaches of the Florentine Fascio, notoriously made up of the most squalid scourings of the city. The political and personal responsibility rests with the head of the Government."

What were the immediate causes that led up to the organization of the Florentine massacre? To that question there is a particular and a general answer. I shall give them in the order named.

In Florence the clandestine periodical Non Mollare has been published regularly for the past twelve months or so. It has come to be recognized as the most authoritative journal in Italy, now that all the others are mere transcripts of government orders or else have to be content with material that does not affect current issues. The Fascist authorities have tried to suppress Non Mollare but failed. It published the Filippelli memorandum and circulated it through Italy. It is always to the fore with authentic revelations of a startling character. And its information has always turned out to be reliable. In its issue of September 20 Non Mollare forecast with perfect accuracy, as proved by the event ten days later, the findings of the prosecuting attorneys in the Matteotti case. On the same date the clandestine paper published information which directly indicted Mussolini as sole authoritative promoter of the Matteotti murder. The arrest of Rossi, Filippelli, and Marinelli was simply a piece of camouflage. This information was recently sworn to by Mussolini's press agent, Cesare Rossi, during his secret examination before the grand jury of the Senate in connection with the De Bono indictment. Rossi explained how Mussolini was the prime mover in founding the Cheka, how Dumini was enthusiastically taken on by him as hired assassin and was employed directly by him in several criminal undertakings, how Mussolini was responsible for the Matteotti murder, and how he lost his nerve and became terrorized when he found that the public had taken up the hue and cry.

All this and more came out in Non Mollare on September 20. Fury raged in Rome. The Freemasons of Florence had long been suspected of knowing something about the publication and circulation of the clandestine paper. Else how could the circulation have been so effective and how could the secret have been so well kept? The result was that a massacre of the Freemasons was ordered and the names were carefully picked out.

That is the particular cause which brought about the order to let the Fascist hordes loose in Florence. The more general reason is stated rather succinctly in the document issued by the Ligue des Droits de l'Homme to which I have already referred. The circular states:

> The savage onslaught on Masonry now organized at Mussolini's instigation is nothing more than a move to use these artificially provoked sanguinary upheavals as a plea for indefinitely putting off the date of the Matteotti trial: because Mussolini knows that at the public hearing of the evidence in court it will not be possible for him to prevent the disclosure of his own direct personal participation in the atrocious crime, as having given the order to the murderers.

What took place at Florence? The whole story has not yet been told. The Tuscan capital was turned into a veritable shambles during the first week of October. Shops were looted, safes ransacked, unarmed persons bludgeoned. At least eighteen respectable and law-abiding citizens were slaughtered by Mussolini's black-shirt soldiery, which is a regularly constituted army, supported out of state funds, and which acted under the orders of its officers during the massacre. That is a point of international importance. All militant Fascists are now enrolled in the national militia. Therefore, when they engage in organized slaughter they engage in it as government troops. Foreign subjects were among the victims in Florence. What will the foreign governments do? On Sunday, October 4, crowds of terrified visitors fled from their hotels and took refuge at the consulates asking for protection. The Swiss and British and American consulates ran up their national flags as in time of war. Yet the foreign press was kept in the dark about the whole affair.

How and why? The why is simple enough and ought to make editors of foreign newspapers take notice. It will be remembered that when the press decree was introduced immediately after the Matteotti crime, for the purpose of keeping Mussolini's complicity in the affair out of print, the first draft of the press law contained a provision whereby foreign correspondents in Italy would be obliged to submit their cables to the local authorities before sending them abroad. But the provision was eliminated under pressure from the more enlightened members of the Cabinet. That does not mean, however, that Mussolini has not found a way of illegally enforcing it in practice. Cables are scrutinized by the Fascist postal officials and destroyed when they contain unfavorable news. More often they are subedited, so that the correspondent is made to say things which he has in reality not written in the cable. But the more prevalent and more effective system is to manufacture false news and send it out through the international agencies, the Italian offices of which are now entirely under Fascist supervision. Ingenuous correspondents take the information manufactured for them and send it abroad in all good faith. Mussolini and Farinacci are not journalists for nothing. They know the value of getting the first story in. And that is how they managed the Florentine affair. They made up their own version and had it sent out through the agencies. According to this, a leading Fascist was killed on the night of October 3. Reprisals set in. The mob called for vengeance and unfortunately one or two persons fell victims to the uncontrolled fury of the Fascists acting in accordance with the violent demands of the multitude. But the Government soon got the situation in hand. That was Farinacci's story.

Liar! The Florentine atrocities started during the last week in September. All had been prearranged and had been openly announced in the Fascist press. Luporini, head of the Florentine Fascio, and a companion of his named Pucci had been carrying out punitive expeditions for ten days previous to the night of October 3. For instance, they invaded the local communal tax office, bludgeoned the doorkeeper and an employee named Bencini. Then they vented their rage on the secretary and left him at death's doors. They next visited the Palazzo Vecchio, the historic city hall of Florence. Here they attacked the non-Fascist employees, seriously wounding a clerk named Lisini, also engineer Torsellini, who was in control of the technical department, and insulting the general secretary, Dr. Magnani. From there they visited police stations and actually bludgeoned a well-known officer who has lost an eye as one of the results.

It was in the course of these organized attacks that Luporini and his accomplices visited the home of a respectable citizen named Bandinelli. They had letters which Bandinelli had written to third parties and sent through the mail. How did they get these letters? Simply enough. The Fascists now control the post and all mail coming or going is submitted to them. Luporini went to Bandinelli's house and demanded an explanation of something which Bandi-

A COMPLETE TECHNIQUE OF IMPERIALISM

DOLLAR DIPLOMACY

BY SCOTT NEARING AND JOSEPH FREEMAN

This astounding record of America's foreign activities is a unique lesson in Empire-Building. Readers of The Nation know many of the separate episodes: marines in Haiti, "oleaginous diplomacy" in Mexico, exploitation in China, financial gymnastics in Europe. Mr. Nearing and Mr. Freeman have made a candid study of each of these and many more, from their origins to the present, and correlated them in a significant pattern.

The picture is startlingly impressive, full of the dramatic interplay of diplomacy and high finance, the fates of small nations, and the new destiny of the United States. It will prove revealing and stimulating even to those acquainted with the separate facts.

J. RUSSELL SMITH

The man who knows most about this subject and can best tell what he knows.

"As interesting as a novel . . . a regional geography which describes and explains the real people of North America in a style that frequently displays the irresistible quality and genius" — James L. Boxeman in the Cincinnati Enquirer.

The population of the United States increased twenty-sevenfold between 1790 and 1920. This increase, without parallel in the history of the world, was accompanied by the use and waste of resources at a speed also unparalleled.

That is the past. What of the future? This is the concern of every intelligent citizen; and a thorough knowledge of the continent on which we live, such as J. Russell Smith knows best how to impart, is a fundamental necessity.

THE STORY OF MAN'S STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM OF THOUGHT

TOLERANCE

by Hendrik VAN LOON

"MR. VAN LOON has brought the same engaging, vivacious style which he developed in THE STORY OF MANKIND and THE STORY OF THE BIBLE, to the story of the most enlarging and civilizing conception which the race has developed. It is the panorama of human history, of which Mr. Van Loon is a master, seen from one point of view, controlled by a single theme, animated by a pervading spirit." — R. M. Lovett, New Republic.

"It is superb history. It is everything else nice which one can say about a notable book. Van Loon has the simplicity of greatness." — Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

"TOLERANCE contains in a single volume just about all that intelligent man or woman needs to know on the subject." — Herschel Brickell, N.Y. Eve. Post.

nelli had written and also demanded the names on his list of correspondents. Bandinelli refused and a noisy altercation ensued. As the Fascists had broken into Bandinelli's home by violence and as it was well known that they had been terrorizing the city for several days, a man from the upstairs flat, named Benciolini, came to the rescue of his neighbor. He was armed with a revolver and in the scuffle Luporini was shot dead. That was made the excuse for turning the city into a slaughter house.

Only when foreign consulates protested did Mussolini call off the wreckers. Farinacci sent an order to cease hostilities on October 5. Then Mussolini gave the prefect and local chief of police a vacation, in order to throw dust in the eyes of outsiders. But he sent congratulations to the Fascist murderers by appointing the notorious Balbo as chief inquisitor and sending him, with plenary power, to hold an inquiry on the whole affair. Balbo was commander-in-chief of the national militia until a year ago. He had to resign because it became public that he had used the militia to carry out murders in the north of Italy and also to protect the murderers against the police. Balbo is famous as the great upholder of the doctrine that all crimes committed by Fascists are done in the sacred cause of the revolution and that therefore no Fascist must be brought to justice. His appointment to temporary supreme control in Florence is a message to the local black shirts that they may safely laugh at any demand made on the part of the people in the interests of common justice.

"I morti pesano," Mussolini once declared, when he began to grow afraid of the crimes in which he found himself being involved, in 1921. The dead weigh heavily. The body of Giacomo Matteotti weighs heavily on Mussolini. He becomes more and more terror-stricken as the possibility of a public trial approaches. He sometimes has fits of uncontrolled terror and envisages plans of escape from Italy. Recently, for instance, Baron Fassini's steam yacht had orders to stand by on the Mediterranean shore, for the purpose of taking the dictator abroad. Did he intend to escape to Spain? One hears all kinds of rumors. But this fact at least is certain: The Florentine horrors were organized principally because a local paper, Non Mollare, had published information about Mussolini's complicity in the Matteotti crime based on evidence laid before the magistrates. If the same evidence had been given in such a case in any other civilized country all the newspapers would have been entitled to publish it. But then if Mussolini had been in any other civilized country he would have been impeached long ago and brought to justice.

WHAT DOES THE WORLD WANT? As we survey the turbulent, restless scene it seems to us that the world needs—and most profoundly wants—intelligence, in high degree; tolerance, of all sorts; fraternity, in increasing measure; peace, in unlimited amount. We are wrong. A bulletin issued by the Department of Commerce on "What the World Wants" tells us that England has a poignant desire for "offals" and the aspirations of Uruguay are for "insecticides" and "clays or mud, facial." Spain does not want relief from her political dictatorship but "soaps in sticks for removing spots on clothing"; Peru asks for "diving suits and equipment." We had supposed that Haiti wanted most of all the return of her independence. Quite otherwise. Her wish is for "fish, salt," while, across the Caribbean, Costa Rica longs not for more abundant life but for "undertakers' supplies and equipment, including caskets." On the other side of the world India, seething with discontent and oppressed by poverty, clamors shrilly for "blue and annealed wire," while China, beset by the Powers without and rebels within, will be satisfied with "chrome kid" and "soda ash, 20 tons." Half a dozen countries, from Canada to South Africa, want "radio sets and parts" and almost as many sigh for "automobiles, low-priced." It is enlightening if not inspiring to learn thus what the world wants. And the disconcerting thought is that perhaps the Department of Commerce is right. How easily is the world satisfied!

WRITES THE LONDON Daily News of President Coolidge's speech before the New York Chamber of Commerce: "It is not easy to think of any parallel to the amazing address of President Coolidge except a certain notorious prayer. The author of that prayer also thanked God that he was not as other men and recorded with the same smirking self-satisfaction his financial right-business and his virtuous self-restraint. No rich parvenu can ever have addressed the humblest poor relation in a tone of more offensively oleaginous patronage than this." Which seems to us the most perfect characterization of this sickening utterance of the President, with its glorification of America's ungenerous policy toward Europe, and its toadying to Big Business—toadying softened, of course, by some warnings to Big Business not to get wholly into the trough, Mr. Coolidge thus carrying water on both shoulders in the established manner of presidential politicians. We confess that we do not know whether we are appalled most by the fact that we have a President who could make such a speech or by the fact that the New York Chamber of Commerce stood up and cheered it for five minutes. Our only consolation is that the editorial comments of out-of-town newspapers which we have seen have confined themselves to a rehash of the President's speech and made little effort to glorify what surely cannot be glorified.

THE NAVY continues to furnish the public with exhibitions of that mistaken loyalty to which we referred editorially last week. Thus, the Shenandoah court of inquiry, after hearing Mrs. Lansdowne, the widow of Commander Lansdowne, called Captain Paul Foley, and after hearing his testimony unanimously whitewashed their brother officer and thereby declared Mrs. Lansdowne to have testified mistakenly or falsely. This is a most extraordinary procedure, for this court was constituted not to try Mrs. Lansdowne or Captain Foley but to investigate the Shenandoah accident. Further than that, the court took the amazing step of ousting from its sacred presence Mrs. Lansdowne's lawyer, although it permitted Captain Foley to be represented by counsel. Of course Captain Foley admitted on the stand that he had been to see Mrs. Lansdowne before her testimony and that he had prepared the statement which she emphatically rejected as false but merely out of kind-heartedness in order to make things easy for her. The Shenandoah court emphatically stated that in calling upon this witness before her appearance and coaching her Captain Foley had acted in accord with navy legal procedure. We can only say that if further proof were needed of the character of our court-martial system this would furnish it. How easy it would make the system of justice in our civil courts if custom and prejudice permitted the prosecuting attorney for the State to go to dangerous witnesses before trial and hand them a statement as a kindly aid to them in formulating what they should say!

THE SWEEPING CONCESSIONS made to China by the Peking Conference would seem to indicate that, in spite of the foreigners in China who look with disfavor on any "softening" on the part of the foreign Powers, those Powers are beginning to see a light. Touched on the pocket-book nerve they react generously and have yielded without conditions to China's demands for complete tariff autonomy. Thus a dispute which began three-quarters of a century ago, as the informative article in this week's International Relations Section shows, is brought to a just and sensible conclusion. Beginning on January 1, 1929, China is to determine her tariff rates for herself, without foreign interference; the present restrictions on the rates, based on treaties with the various Powers, are to be abolished and a sub-committee has been appointed to settle upon rates for the intervening three years, with the Chinese proposals at the Washington Conference—a tariff rate of 12½ per cent effective—as a basis. In return China is to abolish the likin taxes on goods carried within the borders of China itself. The sub-committees will concern themselves with determining a proper substitute for the likin, with the consolidation of China's debt, with the allotment of funds for constructive undertakings, and with the administrative expenses of the Chinese Government. Without any weapons except economic ones, China has managed to defeat the best-armed nations in the world. This should teach the opponents of disarmament a useful lesson.

ANOTHER FRENCH CABINET has gone down before the baffling problem of national finance. It is not surprising, since Painlevé has run back and forth between the Right and Left, changing his program daily in the effort to attract votes. His situation has, of course, been desperately difficult, but it is hard to believe that any adequate plan for financial reform can be devised which depends for its content upon a continual barter for votes. Perhaps a new election will be necessary to lay the basis for an acceptable measure, though such a course would seem to be more or less futile without a definite, drastic program to put before the voters. "Strong Premier Is Sought," says a newspaper headline. Surely; but where is he? And where is the support for him if found? Must some one rise like Mussolini (say it softly) and insure his power by crushing all opposition? Meanwhile, Italy, having been a good child and signed a debt agreement with the United States, gets the promised sugar plum in the form of a $100,000,000 loan floated by the house of Morgan and a long list of our most elite bankers. The loan returns to Italy twenty times what she will pay the United States in the first year—which latter, incidentally, is only one-sixteenth of our own interest charges on the Italian debt.

THE MOST ILLIBERAL BEHAVIOR, we have noticed, often supplies the elements of a liberal education. The present exclusion of the Countess Karolyi, not to mention the gagging of the Count last year, has provided the American people with a thorough course in the fundamentals of democracy—an educational treat which they show no immediate signs of profiting by. The same variety of back-handed enlightenment is being offered the students of Antioch College by a similar act of illiberality. A well-qualified Negro boy, of good background and high intelligence, has been denied admission to that interesting and ordinarily democratic institution. President Morgan referred the matter of his admission to the student government officers, and that body voted against him—on "grounds of expediency." The boy was then refused entrance, though the future policy of the college is still to be decided. Meanwhile the students talk and think and worry about the matter. The Blaze, a non-official student paper, published by a group of lively and independent boys and girls, has opened its few columns to a debate on the subject. Racial characteristics, democratic principles, the value of expediency, the question of coeducation are all discussed; and the supporters of tradition—this time a liberal tradition—are triumphantly quoting the words of the founder of the college, Horace Mann: "Antioch College shall stand always a place where neither sex, color, nor creed shall ever bar young people from an education." The Negro applicant merely by applying for admission to Antioch has provoked almost enough thought and inquiry to recompense him for his lost opportunity if he were interested in becoming a martyr. And next time a Negro tries to enter Antioch we predict that he will be admitted.

WE CANNOT permit Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol to return to his post in Constantinople as the accredited representative of the United States to the Government of Turkey without a word of appreciation of the extraordinary value of his services to the United States. Selected by President Wilson in 1919 to act as our diplomatic agent in a country with which we still have no treaty to reestablish our relations as affected by the war, he has borne himself with tact, skill, and extraordinary common sense despite the difficulties of his anomalous position. These can be illuminated by recalling that, not being a regularly appointed diplomat, he has never met the extraordinary head of the new republic which promises to make a new and progressive state of ancient Turkey. Meanwhile Admiral Bristol has won golden opinions from Americans and Europeans who have come into contact with him either in Turkey or at the Conference of Lausanne and by his talks to interested groups while on this his first visit to his own country since he was sent to Turkey. The Nation is happy to record these facts, first, because it often has to criticize a different type of admiral and, second, because Admiral Bristol is proof that we have the right kind of material for public service abroad if only our executives would look for it without regard to politics or expediency.

ON JUNE 26, LAST, the International Tailoring Company, one of the largest and most powerful of clothing manufacturers, locked out the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in its New York and Chicago shops. The company declared for the open shop and proceeded to hire non-union operators. The union declared a state of war, and proceeded to do everything in its power to frustrate the new arrangement. In the end the union began to pull out foremen—a most harassing measure. For eighteen weeks the struggle continued, relentlessly and bitterly. A few days ago the company, with thousands of dollars' worth of orders on its books and no workers with which to manufacture them, ran up the white flag and capitulated horse, foot, and guns to the union. It has agreed to every provision of the standard union agreement. The winning of this strike means much to the Amalgamated. In beating one of the key employers it has immensely consolidated and strengthened the position of the union. And as a by-product, in that the strike was won by the administration, the left-wing elements in the union, which have been prophesying disaster and collusion with the bosses, are left without that argument. This has made for a much greater measure of internal unity. The fact that locals all over the country have been pouring money in to aid the strikers, and that the investment has now proved more than worth while, is also an important element. Watch the Amalgamated. By and large it has the most able generalship of any labor organization in America. Its aim is an efficient industry, elimination of waste, joint control with management—and the highest possible standard of living for the worker.

THE PULLMAN PORTERS, under the leadership of A. Philip Randolph, are organizing. They have the moral backing of the American Federation of Labor, the Railway Brotherhoods, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The Pullman Company counters with a trained-seal union and an employee-representation plan. A referendum is being taken in respect to the plan. If 51 per cent of the porters vote for it, the company union becomes the official representative of the men. Mr. Randolph charges that the company is attempting to coerce votes by demanding of a porter whether he has voted before he is assigned to a run. Meanwhile Perry W. Howard, a Negro political leader of the State of Mississippi, late on the legal staff of the Pullman Company, and now special assistant to the United States Department of Justice, has issued a blast against Randolph's organization, seeing, according to tradition, the dread hand of Moscow directing its destinies. Great corporations have used the government to crucify their workers often enough, but seldom with such charming audacity.

WHEN BEAVERS BUILD A TOWN they insure not only their water supply but space, light, and ventilation. New York City has a magnificent water supply, but in all other respects it must bow to the beaver. As witness after witness tells his story before the Commission of Housing and Regional Planning, the accelerating chaos of this—the greatest city in the world—becomes luminously evident. New York has not been built for people to live in, or do business in; it has been built in order to sell real estate by the front foot. The main object has been achieved—even Florida and Los Angeles cannot boast such columns of doubloons per square inch—but in this glorious pageant of paper values it becomes (though it ill behooves a local booster like The Nation to admit it) each day increasingly difficult to move, to sleep, to turn around, to breathe. At least so runs the overwhelming preponderance of the testimony before the commission. Mr. Clarence Stein, the chairman, declares that he detects something in the eye of the witnesses that promises concerted action. But it will take us a long time to come abreast of the intelligence of the beaver.

THE CROWNING FASCISTA OUTRAGE has now come to pass. Not content with destroying one newspaper after another, with rigidly censoring those that remain and forbidding them to print any criticism whatever of Fascism and its leaders, Mussolini's organization has now invaded the most sacred of editorial rights—that to accept or refuse manuscripts. With its eye on the votes of contributors, that committee of Fascism which deals with the activities of intellectual workers proposes to take from editors the power to say what articles shall or shall not appear in a daily, weekly, or monthly. Knowing the editor for the dull, unfair, and biased person he is, a Fascist committee composed of persons of "recognized and proved competence" is to pass upon all manuscripts and decide which shall see the light of day. We admit that there are compensations in this; as editors we feel that it would increase our hours for golf and matinees, and yet our blood boils at the thought of our being denied the privilege of attaching our own generously worded rejection slip to the manuscripts we choose to discard. There are some people whose work we reject on sight with savage satisfaction (after making sure that none of the pages are stuck together as a test of the extent of the editor's reading), and others—but we forbear to reveal further editorial secrets. Our mind leaps ahead to the day when Fascism controls America. We can guess the make-up of the committee to accept manuscripts for The Nation. It will comprise Elbert H. Gary, Calvin Coolidge, Reed Smoot, Nicholas Murray Butler, and the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

GOVERNOR HARTLEY of Washington has just thrown out a challenge to the intelligence of that State. In his message to the extraordinary session of the Legislature he dwells upon the large amount expended by the State on education and the small return. Many caustic and generally true remarks are made on the inefficient manner in which the State institutions have been conducted. The Governor's remedy for the educational situation is, however, remarkable. He would abolish the fixed tax levies for the institutions of higher learning and cut their appropriations. If colleges are inefficient, even with large incomes, why not try what they can do on small incomes? Secondly, he would abolish the separate boards of regents for the different institutions and substitute a single board appointed by the Governor. Because the separate boards have not been sufficiently in touch with the educational needs of their constituents, why not try a single board still more out of touch with them? Finally, he would abolish the "fads and frills," i.e., cultural subjects, in the grades and high schools. If Greek and Latin fail to educate, why not try home economics and stenography?

FIRST EDITIONS are temperamental affairs. To the non-collector a catalogue of these rarae aves is hard to understand. Why, for example, should first editions of Mr. Wells and Mr. Shaw never ascend above $4 for one of the former and $15 for the latter, while those of Joseph Conrad, John Masefield, Walter de la Mare, and even John Drinkwater hover near or pass the hundred mark? If $200 is a fair price for a first edition of "Mansfield Park" it seems far too much for one of "The Man of Property." The uninitiated would certainly suppose the former to be the more rare, even assuming that they were quite equal in merit. Austin Dobson brings only $12, George Eliot $20, and a presentation copy of Carlyle's "Past and Present" is offered for $50. Of course the price of a first edition depends upon its rarity; but why should some be given up so cheerfully and some hoarded with such care? A far-seeing person would doubtless lay up for himself treasures for the future; he would buy Mr. Huxley's "Antic Hay" for $4, he would hastily purchase "John Bull's Other Island" for $5, he would cheerfully spend $5 for "A Passage to India." And in twenty-five or fifty years he might have—what? Three rare "firsts," maybe, worth large, fat sums. Or perhaps only three books which together he could not sell for $1.

The Tariff Happy Family

BEFORE us lies a letter of one of the foremost American bankers interested in international finance which reads in part as follows: "If we insist that the Europeans shall pay their debts to us and yet realize that the only way they can do so is through the medium of goods or services, if at the same time we bar out their goods by our tariff laws and bar out their services by our immigration laws, we set them a pretty difficult task." Many similarly placed financiers hold like views. They are going so far, some of them, as to state privately that they are ready for a tariff for revenue only, if not for free trade. They have loaned enormous sums to Europe and, notably in the case of France, they are beginning to be much worried about their ability to get their money back. Their prestige is deeply involved since they have placed billions of European securities among their customers throughout the United States. Some of them are not only beginning to feel that we have set Europe "a pretty difficult task," but frankly consider it an impossible one.

They are, therefore, out of self-interest, if one pleases, working quietly under the surface for a modification of the whole range of duties, and they must find themselves compelled to admit the correctness of the declaration last week of Representative Cordell Hull of Tennessee that the easy terms granted to Italy in the settlement of her debt are due to the tariff.

"Our existing high tariff," he says, "virtually eliminates the factor of payment in goods of Italy. . . . The United States is now at the crossroads with respect to this entire problem as it relates to the tariff. . . . For several years Republican leaders have pushed up their tariffs and at the same time preached that not a dollar of our foreign debt should be forgiven." He insists that later on this will mean the virtual loss of foreign indebtedness to us.

This attitude brings the bankers into conflict with the protected manufacturers, and for the first time since the era of high tariffs began in America we have a rift in the ranks of those who have cajoled or bought or threatened the government into going into partnership with them in order to insure themselves generous profits. The cleft is going to widen as time passes, for the money we have loaned to Europe is not coming back soon, if at all, and the manufacturers, many of whose establishments are kept alive solely because the government indirectly guarantees prices, are certain to rouse themselves to great efforts to retain the existing status. For this purpose they may be relied upon to use to the fullest extent the shibboleths which they and the bankers invented years ago. Would you have the bread taken out of the mouths of our American workmen? Would you have the war-wrecked countries of Europe, especially our recent enemies, dumping their pauper-made goods in this country? The manufacturers are certain to draw the most touching pictures of what will happen to this country if we lower any tariff by a single cent. Indeed, they may be counted on to point to the situation in the New England cotton industry as a reason for higher, and not lower, tariff taxes. In that case it is Southern and not foreign competition which is rousing the New England mill-owners, but that will not affect the arguments. Speaking for an industry with an investment of more than $500,000,000, which employs 125,000 workers and produces $600,000,000 in goods annually, the Massachusetts mill-owners demand the return of the ten-hour day, the removal of the ban which prevents women working after 6 p. m., and the reinstatement of the double shift. Every argument used by them against Southern competition, such as child labor, longer hours, lower wages, "lenient industrial laws," and geographical advantages, will be used just as stridently when the proposal to lower the tariff is made by the bankers. Would you ruin America to line the pockets of the victims of our bankers who knew what chances they were taking when they sent their capital abroad? This will be the chief query of the manufacturers, whose standards will, one and all, bear the slogan "America first."

But the question of the foreign indebtedness to us, whether incurred by governments or private individuals, is not the only foreign development which is worrying our tariff devotees. In a recent address Secretary Hoover denounced the government control of raw materials abroad as an international menace. "This sort of control of production and price," he said, "exists today in coffee, silk, nitrates, potash, rubber, quinine, iodine, tin, sisal, some dye-stuffs, quicksilver, certain canning extracts, and some other things. To demonstrate that this is not an inconsequential matter requires only the recitation of the fact that we expend annually about $800,000,000 for imports now subject to such control." There you have the typical American attitude. We wish to hog our own markets and we build high-tariff walls in order to keep the other fellow's goods out, and then when the other fellow decides to utilize his monopolies for all that they are worth and to fix high prices we denounce him for his selfishness and his outrageous misapplication of one of the practices of the war when the Allies established a control of raw materials and parceled them out in the amounts and at the prices that they saw fit. Yet Secretary Hoover thinks he is quite justified in rebuking those who seek simply to profit by their natural resources, while he favors letting the owners of our own natural monopolies and resources have their own sweet way with the rest of us Americans, charging us what they see fit and regulating their products as they rig the markets. It is astonishing how the boot pinches when on the other foot!

Still another complication for our happy tariff family is the growing demand of some of our farmers for more and not less protection for their produce. True, some of the farm organizations are beginning to see the folly of this, but if our information is correct the President is merely seeking an excuse not only to keep up the tariffs on agricultural products but to raise them still further, with an eye to decreasing the farmer revolt in the Northwest. The Tariff Commission now plans to send to the President some twenty recommendations in regard to existing tariff rates prior to January 1. Mr. Coolidge will therefore be compelled to show his hand on some of these unless he pigeonholes them all, as he did the commission's recommendation on sugar. Finally, a large delegation from the Pacific Coast has been in Washington for weeks complaining bitterly against the flood of imports at their ports. Uneasy lies the head that wears a tariff crown!

Saintsbury, Octogenarian

THE London Times saluted George Saintsbury on the occasion of his eightieth birthday a few weeks ago with the remark that he must still be a young man because he had always written like one and still continued to write like one. The truth of this remark lies more, perhaps, in its implication that Mr. Saintsbury has never changed than in its attribution to him of all the qualities of youth. For in a sense he was already very old when he began to write reviews a half-century ago for the Manchester Guardian. He was old, that is to say, in a fashion not inconsistent with the vigor of fewness of years—he was both a tory and a boy. A recent editorial in the Guardian, presumably by one who remembered Mr. Saintsbury in those early days, records among other things that he seemed even at thirty to have read every book in the world and to have heard every idea; and one can be sure that he composed his first paragraph for print with the same appalling sophistication, the same energetic contempt for highfalutin novelty, that has distinguished him from all other British critics during two generations. But whether he has continued to be young or to be old, there can be no doubt that continuance has been his virtue; he has not changed in character, and he has not lost in strength. And what is more of a compliment still, he has not ceased in any degree to keep the respect of the newest literary generation. Few men of letters at eighty are attractive to their thirty-year-old contemporaries, and almost no critic ever is. None in America is now, and on the continent of Europe Georg Brandes is conspicuous because unique in this respect.

"I have never yet given a second-hand opinion of any thing, or book, or person," wrote Mr. Saintsbury in the preface to his "Notes on a Cellar-Book" five years ago. That is one of the reasons why he has continued to be fresh. Another is contained in the following remark from the latest of all his books: "I have never tried to be in the fashion for the sake of being in it, and seldom, I think, to be out of it merely for the sake of being out of it. Logic and history have been the only external guides I have accepted in temporal things, except where pure taste has reigned alone—as for things not temporal one need not speak here." And there must be many more explanations for the fact that the author of "A History of Criticism," "A History of English Prosody," and "The Peace of the Augustans" has known for eighty years how to enjoy a green old age.

It is to be hoped that future historians of English criticism, when they are assigning the various reasons for Mr. Saintsbury's great position, will not neglect to mention one of Mr. Saintsbury's own reasons. Speaking of the wines which he had experienced through a long career devoted in one or another aspect to what he likes to call "the fruit of the tree of knowledge," he said in the "Notes on a Cellar-Book": "When they were good they pleased my senses, cheered my spirits, improved my moral and intellectual powers, besides enabling me to confer the same benefits on other people." Mr. Saintsbury in his later years has revealed himself as a delectable taster and connoisseur of wines no less than of books. Prohibition—threatened in England and accomplished in America—has been his particular torment in a time when there are enough torments for a tory anyway. And he has improved every opportunity to speak his mind upon the matter. It may not be out of place to record that one of Mr. Saintsbury's most interesting observations in this connection is to be found in a foot-note to page 40 of "Notes on a Cellar-Book." This is the foot-note:

> One of the most agreeable incidents of my life in connection with port is quite recent. Soon after I had published something about wine in the Athenaeum, and since America "went dry," two students of that misguided country wrote to me saying that they had found it impossible to refrain, after reading the article, from sallying forth, purchasing some so-called port wine (I hope it was not very bad), and drinking my health in it. It would be difficult for a teacher to have a more gratifying testimonial to the efficacy of his teaching; especially when he remembers the boasts of prohibitionists as to bringing on prohibition by sowing pseudo-scientific tarradiddles in United States school-books.

We think we know who these two students were, and we are wondering whether we should hand them over to the executioner.

College Athletics—Play or Work?

A FORMER football player of Harvard University, George Owen, Jr., of the class of 1923, has written an article for the Independent of November 7 in which he says:

> It is a crisp Saturday afternoon in October, and we are among the thousands of spectators at an important college football game. "Wouldn't you like to be in there, George?" comes the question from a neighbor. "No, I would not," is the spontaneous reply. In view of the fact that I played college football for four years and was fortunate enough to be a member of winning teams, this may seem a strange answer; but it was the only honest answer I could give.

The writer expresses his belief that a majority of college football players do not enjoy playing the game. The reason is the "terrific grind necessary to keep in the running." He continues:

> You can't play the game and smile both. I well remember a coach who, on finishing a preliminary "fight talk" to a team two hours before it went on the field for an important game, said: "I don't want to see a smile on any one of your faces before [illegible]." ... As a result, the possibility of failure prays so on the mind of the player that his capacity for enjoyment of the game as a game is, in many cases, completely [illegible] only after the season is over that he can look back with any pleasure on what he has been through, and then the degree of pleasure is measured largely by the degree of the team's success.

No one who knows anything about our colleges will question or be surprised at these statements. And they may be extended from football to apply to all branches of what are known as "major athletics." The most interesting thing about so frank a confession, perhaps, is that it should be made by one who is barely off the college campus. That college athletics are beginning to lose some of their glamor for the undergraduates (though not yet for the alumni) seems possible if for no other reason than that a change in fashion is about due—a rising sense of boredom against so artificial and absurd and top-heavy an institution. We note, for instance, an editorial in the Ohio State Candle for October in which college athletics receive a merciless keelhauling.

Of course the argument of Mr. Owen, that college football is more of a grind than a pleasure, is not necessarily a condemnation. Indeed it may be regarded as quite the contrary. Since in most colleges athletics are the chief—possibly the only—means by which a student may attain fame and popularity, competition in them is going to be the most serious purpose of such undergraduates as feel they stand any chance of success. It is fortunate, therefore, that the competition is a "terrific grind"—that it affords the discipline which is a big object of a college course.

It is not the athlete that is so much to be pitied as the nine-out-of-ten college students who can't get on teams and have to content themselves with the mere hurrah of the grandstand. When they come to see that their part in college athletics is the apex of ludicrousness and futility—and that time may be at hand—there is likely to be a change.

Fortunately when the mass of undergraduates sense the absurdity of their athletic worship, the way out is easy. There is no "problem" to it, although timid university trustees often talk as if there were. The abolition of intercollegiate contests, and the substitution of interclass games, would at one puff blow over the whole exaggerated, lopsided, professionalized structure. The officers of most of our colleges don't dare do anything so drastic. But some day the students will.

The Revolt Against Military Training

> The object of all military training is to win battles.
> The inherent desire to fight and kill must be carefully watched for and encouraged by the instructor.
> The principles of sportsmanship and consideration for your opponent have no place in the practical application of this work.

WITH such maxims as these, taken from the prescribed "Manual of Military Training," did the opponents of compulsory training at the College of the City of New York launch their remarkably skilful and energetic campaign against it. The college publication, the Campus, took the lead. The whole college was aroused. Although an optimistic dean expressed the opinion that not more than half of the regularly enrolled students would vote on the question of a petition to the trustees for the abolition of compulsory military training, before the end of the second day of balloting over 2,000 out of 3,200 had voted, and the final vote was 2,092 to 345. We are informed that this is the largest total vote which any referendum among the students of the College of the City of New York has ever called out. The interest in the question was obviously intense and the result of the referendum is decisive and immensely encouraging.

What the trustees will do with this petition is another matter. Sidney Mezes, the president, is already on record in favor of continuing compulsory military training. Mr. Mezes will be remembered as the man who marshaled the American experts on peace in behalf of his brother-in-law, Colonel House, when we were preparing to make a peace appropriate to victory in a war to end war. According to one newspaper report he believes that this training in killing is good "both for the health and the patriotism of the students." It must disappoint even his optimism to find that his students have so little appreciation of what is good for them.

As a matter of fact, none of the conventional justifications for compulsory military training in our colleges is intellectually creditable. Military training is by no means the best form of physical exercise. Military discipline demonstrably has not produced that type of self-discipline upon which the best citizenship depends. It is only for propaganda purposes that army officers speak of military instruction as a training for citizenship. When they are candid they admit that its real object is "to win battles." Least of all does the kind of teaching given to our Reserve Officers Training Corps tend to produce the friendly spirit which is essential to international peace. Thus an Iowa student writes: "While I was in military classes I was having nurtured in me distrust of other nations." He went on to quote his officers as having said: "We are getting the dirty end of the stick on the 5-5-3 ratio. Other nations are not disarmed like the United States. Look out for Japan."

Universities and colleges which owe allegiance to the world-wide republic of letters and science are the last places where this sort of teaching should be given—where an element so alien to academic freedom as the typical military mind should be given such large powers over students. It is therefore intensely disappointing to those who look to our institutions of higher learning for intellectual and social leadership to find the average college president the eulogist of a system of compulsory military training which in so far as it is effective is necessarily destructive of the highest ideals of his profession. The tendency of many of our colleges and State universities to make military training compulsory for their students, without any necessity whatsoever in law, is in itself a kind of disloyalty to the deeply rooted American aversion to compulsory military training and service. Whatever the law says, it is compulsory military training and service when a boy anxious for an education can secure it only at the price of at least two years' required work in military courses.

If the attitude of many college and university authorities is disappointing, the increasing spirit of revolt in student bodies is correspondingly heartening. Students of the University of Wisconsin took the lead in the campaign which forced the State legislature to abolish the compulsory feature of military training in that great university. Students in Pomona College persuaded the board of trustees to end compulsory military training in that institution. Last spring students in Howard University and the University of Minnesota made notable protests against compulsory military training. An effective agitation is beginning at Ohio State University and we know not how many others. The University of Missouri, like the College of the City of New York, recently arranged for a student referendum under supervision of the Student Council on the question of compulsory military training. But before the vote was taken the regents unanimously indorsed compulsion and at the request of the president the vote was called off. Influential groups of students, however, are so determined that they are already talking of following the example of the Wisconsin students and carrying the fight to the State legislature. In examples like these—and they are increasing fast—is new ground for confidence in the spirit of youth, new ground for hope that America may be restored to leadership in the pursuit of world peace.

Giving Europe Another Chance

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

London, November 13

CYNICISM is often chosen by old age to smooth its pillow and make its bed comfortable. That does not necessarily mean that age has abandoned the faith of youth; it may only mean that the kind of experience which life affords for those who deal much with men makes them patient and tolerant with human weakness and inclines them to receive what Carlyle regarded as the great and grand verities, certainly not without honor and homage, but with a familiar pat on the back. I confess that the Locarno Pact puts such thoughts into my head.

When it was signed, and still later when it was published, I was in East and Middle Europe, and though moving in places where public men rubbed shoulders and exchanged views, the interest in it was quite secondary. These countries were full of war problems. Indeed, I do not exaggerate very much when I say that the only reason why there was peace in some of the places visited was that the countries had no resources upon which to fight. When in due course my English newspapers came glowing with Locarno, and when even the Times tuned its harp up to millennial pitch (an outburst which gave great amusement in a diplomatic circle one night), it was difficult for me to adjust myself to the strange contrast between my environment and my newspapers. Even when correspondents informed me that Locarno was being made in England a purely party triumph and was being used to enable the Government to recover some of its lost prestige and influence, I had to come nearer home before I could appreciate its significance. In the theater where war is most likely to break out and from which it is most likely to spread, Locarno was of remote interest.

What is its real significance regarding the more Western states? One is told that this pact means that Germany is to accept forever the Rhine frontier arrangements imposed upon it by the Treaty of Versailles (just as if France had signed a pact about 1880 binding itself to remove from the Place de la Concorde the statues of the forfeited towns and dream of Alsace-Lorraine no more) and that both countries bind themselves to submit all quarrels to arbitration. Certainly a document with such words upon it looks to be worth something, and as practically every newspaper in Western Europe welcomes it, it is worth something on that ground alone. The newspapers welcome it but not for the same reasons; indeed they differ profoundly in that respect. Public men, like the newspapers, unite in acclaiming it, and quarrel as to the reasons that happen to have brought them together. But we must not be too meticulous on these points. Whoever can get Europe to believe in peace, to believe that it is secure, to believe that it has found a cure for itself, will have done something to give Europe peace, security, and cures. It is really something to get the whole of Western Europe saying with its prayers every morning: "I am good; I am getting better in every way day by day." The document that sets Europe doing that may have as little in it as the proverbial doctor's prescription of aqua pura, but it may be of great benefit. The quack cures as well as the doctor. Here genial cynicism comes in, not to destroy faith but to protect it by widening its foundations. The psychological effect of the Locarno compact will give Europe a chance of putting its house further in order. It is true that about half the German population will decline to accept Locarno just as a similar instrument would have failed to get the support of a united France in 1880; it is true that the moral wrong done by some provisions of the Treaty of Versailles will defy all instruments of peace till they are removed; it is true that a quarrel between France and Germany about the Rhine frontiers would not be the direct cause of a European war if such a thing ever comes again; it is true that the arbitration provisions are obscure in relation to the actual processes by which another war would come; it is true that the pact does not touch the really dangerous problems of Europe and has several unlocked back doors through which war can escape to ravage mankind. When that is admitted, and when to that is added that a courageous handling of the European situation would have produced a better and a wider agreement than this, Locarno may be made a historical landmark in the development of our political civilization.

If this is to happen, however, the pact must be approached in the mind of critical and reserved welcome rather than in that of our relieved and thankful government newspapers. We have been too often deceived by these pious appearances and superficial promises of all being well. Locarno does not deal with any immediate cause of European war; it only deals with matters that would be reopened in the event of a European war breaking out; it provides that France and Germany would not fight over their own quarrels, it does not provide that they shall not fight over other peoples'; its declarations are good, but they do not visualize the ways in which Europe will be involved in war. If the good psychological effect of this agreement is allowed to wear off without a removal of the real causes of wars being effected, Europe will look back upon these days with regret and disappointment. Locarno settles none of the real war problems of Europe; it does predispose men's minds to become busy about their settlement.

We may assume that Germany will now join the League of Nations. This will be, so far as substance goes, a security for peace worth a dozen Locarno pacts. Indeed, it seems to me that the diplomacy which would have brought Germany to Geneva and then worked the League of Nations with all its new authority to remove the causes of war and prevent those that remained from becoming effective would have been far sounder than that pursued at Locarno. To divide Germany on what Europe considers to be a great instrument of security by putting into that instrument declarations of good behavior upon matters imposed upon Germany by the fortunes of war is of doubtful wisdom and may well give rise to fears in other parts of Europe that as important political sections in Germany refuse to sanction Locarno the security which it offers has not in reality the moral backing of the nation. This, however, is a matter of judgment, and by wise subsequent handling the grounds for this objection can be removed.

Suffice it to say that the entry of Germany into the League opens many doors for a day-to-day harmonious cooperation between the nations. That is the main thing to aim at. Here I have in mind among other things the continued existence of the Conference of Allied Ambassadors in Paris and questions arising out of the occupation of the Rhineland and the Saar and the military control in Germany, which [illegible]

The problems of the Middle and the East of Europe are still untouched save in so far as they may be dealt with under the Covenant of the League itself. The solution of some of them—like the treatment of minorities—should be hastened, however. To this, again, the presence of Germany on the Council of the League should contribute greatly. Akin to this is the question whether Germany should receive mandates for colonial responsibilities. Every scientific student of colonial administration knows that Germany was making some fine contributions to the subject. Like the rest of us, it was making some bad mistakes, but nothing it did was worse than what has just happened at Damascus, and its colonial record suffered during the war from stories of the same class as the human fat boiling vats. The world cannot afford that the scientific research work into subjects like tropical disease, which Germans were conducting before the war, should be brought to a sudden end.

Furthermore, behind all problems of national security is the question of disarmament. The reference to this in the Locarno Pact is not satisfactory, though in actual operation it may become so. This has to be pushed ahead with sleepless application so long as the psychology of Locarno lasts. If that goes, the chances of disarmament on any drastic scale go with it. For the moment the political powers are master of the military services and can issue orders to them. If these services are allowed to assume the almost sovereign authority they exercised before the war—when they were creating conditions that made their assistance necessary—no political agreements will stand the pressure of a growing fear and lack of confidence. Now is the moment to drive trust away from armed force on to political wisdom. Let us destroy the altars of the false gods and it will be easier to induce the people to bring their offerings to the altars of the true ones.

In a sentence, the value of Locarno depends upon how the opportunities it presents are used. Of itself, it may indeed mean nothing; if it is regarded as an opportunity of doing work that is substantial and that really removes the causes of war and creates in the world an instrument endowed with unchallengeable moral authority to secure peace, it may mean everything. So, even while one may look upon it with feelings of genial and generous cynicism and in consequence of it philosophize on the strangeness of crowd psychology—the flimsiness of the foundations of hope and fear alike—all that the cynicism may amount to is this, that the most strenuous of well-doers may have to be reminded that the whims and the weaknesses of mass opinion have to be humored, and that the baseless confidences of the crowds may, as a matter of fact, be turned into solid foundations for very substantial structures.

More Power to the Bankers*

By W. Z. RIPLEY

TWO changes in the nature and conduct of corporations, characteristic of the post-war period, have a direct bearing upon the future of private business in its relation to the supervisory or regulating agencies of the state. They are both bound to increase the likelihood of an extension rather than a lessening of the powers and activities of such bodies as the Federal Trade Commission. Fundamental these changes are, inasmuch as they strike at the very taproot of our capitalistic system. For this system is founded upon the theory that the private, as distinct from the common, ownership of property best conduces to the public welfare, because such possession involves the giving of a gage or guaranty by the owner to his fellow-citizens for thrifty, efficient, far-sighted, and public-spirited management thereof. His is the reward if he be successful. And he bears the loss in case of misdirection. Otherwise stated, it is the fundamental principle, interwoven throughout all human relationships, that power and responsibility must ever be yoked together. It is because these two developments directly assail this principle that I hold them to be sinister and of grave public import.

The first of these changes is the divorce of the ownership of property, represented by securities emitted by corporations or trustees, from any direct accountability whatsoever, for its prudent and efficient management. The second change is the wide and ever-accelerating diffusion of a considerable portion of this ownership, represented by stock holdings of employees and of the direct consumers, both of public utility corporations and of private business companies as well. The net result of both changes is the assumption of an absolute control by intermediaries—most commonly bankers, so-called—in place of the former responsibility for direction which, theoretically at least, rested upon the shoulders of the actual owners.

Both these tendencies menace alike the welfare of the private owners themselves and of the working classes; and they put the public interest in the sound and straightforward management of these businesses in jeopardy—not because bankers, as such, are more frail than other people in general but simply because the possession of uncontrolled power is always certain to entail abuse, whereby both innocent and guilty are alike dragged down. The result, therefore, unless present tendencies are taken in hand, will necessarily be the extension of the activity of such bodies as the Federal Trade Commission, acting for the protection of those who have unwittingly made themselves wards of the state in respect of their possessions.

The practical disappearance of the individual and partnership forms of business organization in favor of the corporation took place before the war. Almost a thousand companies are now listed on the New York Stock Exchange alone—163 railroads and 763 other corporations. The present transformation is merely in respect to the seat of power over their direction. All kinds of private businesses are being bought up by banking houses; and new corporations are being substituted for the old, in order that the purchase price (and more) may be recovered by sale of shares to the general public. But the significant change is that the new stock, thus sold, is entirely bereft of any voting power, except in case of actual or impending bankruptcy. General stockholders, to be sure, have always been inert, delegating most of their powers of election. But, at worst, they might always be stimulated to assert themselves; and, in any event, they all fared alike as respects profits or losses. Under the new style of corporations, such general stockholders are badly deprived of all rights in this direction, and new preferred stocks are sold up to the hilt of the value of the assets, if not beyond. The issues are called preferred stocks. They are really bonds. And, instead, as formerly, of being limited to a half or two-thirds of the tangible assets, no limit is now set, except the powers of absorption of the investing public.

Every kind of business is being swept into this maelstrom. All of our public utilities, except railroads; chain and department stores, foodstuffs, washing machines, refrigerators, confectionery, make-believe silk stockings, toilet and beauty preparations, our daily bread, our cake, and our ice cream—even our home-made pies! Every conceivable article of direct or indirect consumption is covered by the change. The recent Dodge Motors Company is typical. A banking house buys up a private business for, let us say, $146,000,000. This sum and more it recovers by the sale to the public for $160,000,000 of bonds, preferred stock, and 1,500,000 non-voting shares of "Class A" common stock. But not a single one of the 500,000 "Class B" voting common shares is thus sold. The promoters have virtually paid themselves a handsome profit for the assumption of the entire directorial power, having mortgaged the property to the full amount of its original cost, including both assets and capitalized earning power.

Perhaps the baldest case of this sort is that of an artificial silk concern, which thus sold (let us hope?) 598,000 shares of non-voting "Class A" stock, reserving 2,000 of the total 600,000 shares as "Class B" stock carrying exclusive voting rights. There is no concealment about it. But who, may we ask, has given a hostage to fortune for honest and economic management of the business? The promoters stand to lose only the amount of their stake—a minus quantity in dollars, leaving aside, of course, the moral obligation. It is the public stockholders who stand to lose their all in case of misdirection. And most of them have parted with any hope of participation in future profits over and above their fixed return: by agreement in the subscription to forfeit all "preemptive" rights in the issue of new stock. How can there be other than a whirlwind of abuse of power under such conditions?

As for the second financial fashion—the wide distribution of stock to employees and to consumers of the corporation's product, whether electric service, steel, or what-not—the effect is bound to be cumulative with that of insinuation of banking power between ownership and operation. Corporations have always been susceptible to control by concentration of voting power. Far less than half of the capital stock may be as effective for such control as possession of an actual majority. But it is elemental, requiring no proof, that the larger the number of shareholders, the more easily may a small concentrated block of minority holders exercise sway over all the rest. With a dozen owners, probably 51 per cent will be necessary for dominance. With 300,000 scattered holdings, a possible 15 or 20 per cent of the votes can never be overmatched at an election. In 1923 there were 250,000 new stockholders registered in the electric light and power companies alone. The total number of stockholders in all sorts of concerns has almost doubled since 1900, rising to an aggregate of 14,423,000 in 1923. These shareholders now possess over $70,000,000,000 worth of stock at par, on the showing of the federal income-tax returns. Such possession used to be confined to the wealthy and the well-to-do class. Now it comprehends the small householder and large numbers of wage-earners. The former concentration of wealth is now yielding place to so wide a diffusion as to call for public recognition by way of legislation or oversight. But the important point to note is that the wider the diffusion of ownership the more readily does effective control run to the intermediaries, in this case promoters, bankers, or management companies.

The foregoing dangerous tendencies are much aggravated, also, by reason of the operation of a number of highly artificial legal devices which serve to isolate still further the property owner from control over his investment. The holding company, voting trusts, trusts set up for the living, the moribund, or the dead, the investment trust, and finally the intervention of the life-insurance companies as investing agents for their policy-holders—each and every one of these has latterly insinuated itself to still further set off ownership from responsibility in management. It is all cumulative—and, in the aggregate, fraught with the gravest possibilities.

Many remedies for undue concentration of power of direction of corporations have been suggested. There is one which stands forth preeminently. Publicity of accounts and their standardization are likely to be most serviceable as a check upon otherwise unrestrained control. These millions of investors and the public, even if they have so confidingly given their possessions over into the care of others, have a right to full and complete unmitigated information. There lies an appropriate function for a rejuvenated and enlarged federal commission to discharge an obligation of the federal government to a great and in many respects a helpless body of our citizens.

Autumn Nocturne

By DAVID MORTON

Listen how slow the rain is stepping there,
More to itself than any other thing,
For never leaf or blossom, now, will care
What song of all her songs the rain will sing.
For thus the summer world is sung asleep,
Hearing the surest rainfall on the ground
Fainter . . . and faint—till slumbers grow too deep
For listening any longer to this sound.
Tomorrow I shall see, as I go by,
How leaf and petal, delicately curled,
Are drowned in sleep and lost to earth and sky,
Where nothing is remembered from the world,
But all things are forgotten that were plain—
Even this last-heard, drowsy sound of rain.

The Democrats Desert

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, November 23

BEYOND doubt the outstanding thing about the present political period is the extraordinary swing of the country away from the old attitude of belligerence toward Big Business and its general acceptance of the benevolent belief that the prosperity of the little fellow wholly hinges upon that of the big fellow, that if only the latter is well looked after automatically the former will be cared for and need no special consideration.

While it is not often stated as nakedly as that, political students of all parties and sections are in complete accord as to the truth of the change. Loads of examples could be cited but they are not needed. The dominating presence of Mr. Mellon in the official Cabinet and of Mr. Morrow in the unofficial Cabinet are enough. Ten years ago an open connection, public or private, with either would have put a political blight upon any Administration. Reflections upon the reasons for the about-face of the public in regard to our money kings open up an interesting speculative field, but in the end it all gets back to the basic fact of the general prosperity.

That is the key to the nation-wide political situation. It is the full explanation of why, with the prosperity current still swiftly flowing, it is not possible to interest the people in any issue or question whatever save that of keeping it flowing. Why bother about anything else so long as business keeps up? That is the thoroughly natural and nearly unanimous feeling of the American people.

No better illustration of the strength of this tide need be sought than the present attitude of the Democratic leaders in the House toward the Coolidge-Mellon theory that the way to reduce taxes is to cut those on the big incomes first and most. They have gulped, but swallowed it. Apparently their purpose is to join the Republicans in reporting a revenue bill heavily slashing the maximum surtax and less heavily taxes on smaller incomes. It will be the Mellon bill all right, although astonishing pains, for such righteous people, are being taken to keep it from being called the Mellon bill. For their acquiescence in the feature about which the Administration is particularly concerned, namely, the cutting of the 40 per cent surtax, the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee are cordially praised by one section of the daily press, while grudgingly given credit by another for the sense to cease opposing the tax program of the great and good Mr. Coolidge.

As a matter of fact, they deserve no credit—these Democrats. Whether the Mellon theory with which the country has been so completely saturated is right or wrong—and there are certainly two sides to it—in their hearts these Democrats do not believe either in it or in the Coolidge-Mellon-Republican doctrine that the little fellow is bound to be all right if the big fellow gets what he wants first. They would not be Democrats if they did not hate that doctrine. That is a Republican, not a Democratic idea.

It is the little fellow who has always been the particular care of the Democrats. They have in the past always championed his cause. It is true they never did much for him, but still they were his consistent advocates. It was the big fellow to whom the Republicans cottoned, the business interests which they championed. This line of cleavage between the parties was deeper than that of the tariff or any other issue. It was the real difference between them.

Now we find the House Democrats swung completely around to the Republican view and as eager as their opponents to batter down the surtax on the big incomes. It is not, however, a matter of conviction with them—it's merely a matter of cowardice. It is not the Democrats who have changed on the country but the country that has changed on the Democrats. The crumbs from the prosperity banquet table at which for nearly four years the big fellows have been gorging are so numerous, succulent, and satisfying to the little fellow that all his old truculence toward the "interests" has evaporated. The great gratification of getting a share of the easy money of the period makes it impossible to divert him from the effort to make his share as large as possible or get him excited because somebody is getting very much more. If he were not getting his he could be more easily stirred to wrath at the inequality of things. As it is, he has no time to reflect on that.

Then, too, the newspapers and periodicals upon which the millions intellectually feed, and which formerly preached that the big corporations and very rich men were powerful enough to protect themselves and it was the average citizen who needed help, have, since the first Mellon bill two years ago, strongly taken the other tack, and now with curious and significant unanimity hold that the tax burden must be lightened first on the very wealthy in order that the very poor may prosper.

The extent to which the country is soaked with this idea is practically unprecedented. It is too much for the House Democrats. They have thrown their hands in the air and given up. Disbelieving in the theory, disputing the soundness of the two main Mellon arguments, first, that reduction in the surtax will release more capital for industry and, second, that it will induce rich men to transfer their fortunes from the tax-exempt to the taxable securities; believing, as some of them do not hesitate to say, that it is a backward social step, they have agreed to it, they privately concede, because of the impossibility of getting any sort of real backing for a fight for what should be the natural Democratic view. Back in their districts the influential newspapers and important Babbitt Democrats, as well as Republicans, are all for the Mellon idea. It isn't in these House Democrats to continue to stand against that sort of sentiment. As a matter of fact, it is too much to expect of them. Said one of the best of the lot the other day: "What's the use? The party in power is bound to get the credit for the reduction and if we fight the bill because the principle is bad all we get is hell for standing in the way. Every newspaper and every bank director is for the surtax cut. Nobody is going to stop and reason the thing out. The propaganda is too overwhelming. We can't get backing for a fight and it's bad politics to make it. The thing for us to do is get this taxation business over as quickly as possible and take up something else."

The at least temporary political expedience of this can hardly be questioned, but no claim that it is high-minded has yet been made. It is, however, in the Senate the real test will come. What the House does in these matters is more often than not entirely negligible. At the other end of the Capitol are a number of fairly determined men who believe the right way to reduce taxes is from the bottom up, not from the top down, and who have been neither sufficiently gullible nor sufficiently craven to fall for a propaganda more powerful and persistent than has been concentrated upon any other single legislative step in this generation. There will be a fight over there.

Anthracite Country

II. The Town

By ANNE HARD

"FOREIGNERS"—whose names for one another are as bewilderingly unlike the ethnographer's categories as these black rivers are unlike the silver streams of New England or the tawny streams of the South. These dwellers in "the patch" are not always as destitute as you would guess from a cursory glance at their paintless houses, their tumble of shed and fence. They draw themselves into a stove-warmed room when the wind whistles coldly across these mountains. They live under the slight shade when the untempered summer sun blisters the blackened hills and reflects from the ovens of the culm heaps and piles of slaty refuse. They extract some comfort from circumstances in their own way. But they tuck their money into savings.

When they first came here — when they first were fetched here in their hundreds, unbelievably innocent of American things, they got no interest on their savings. Instead, they paid the banks to keep those savings safe for them. Those days—like many other matters of the anthracite country—are over. Now those savings lie in the banks of Scranton and Wilkes-Barre and Hazleton untouched and with their interest accumulating upon their heads.

"Do you know who we like to see come into our store to buy?" said the wife of a local hardware dealer in a certain mining town. "Not the Americans. No. The 'Slavish.' An American woman comes in with a fine coat, buys a cheap dish-pan, and pays part down. The 'Slavish' woman comes in—maybe with a shawl over her head, asks which is the very best dish-pan we have, takes out a fat wad, and pays cash."

It is some miles of tangled roads, a trolley trip or a spin in a car to the next "step up" from the patch. In the patch, foreigners and their old ways. In the mining towns—in Pottsville, in Hazleton, in Mahanoy City, in McAdoo, Shenandoah, and Shamokin—they are becoming "Americanized." The greatest local excitement in McAdoo —no one knows who named it; it has some hundreds of bleak frame houses up and down half-paved streets and about a dozen churches, sharp-spired and onion-domed against the sky—in McAdoo the greatest local excitement after eight weeks of the strike was a "Charleston" competition. They talked about the strike but they grew voluble about the merits of Mr. Wida against Miss Parsnik as exponents of the "Charleston."

Hazleton is a mining town. It is said 80 per cent of it depends upon the mining industry, although there are some other interests there. I choose to speak of it as an example of that next "step up." How fast it may be made! "Gift shops" with just the same things you may find in Connecticut Avenue in Washington, or Michigan Boulevard in Chicago, or the forties, say, in New York. Book and stationery shops—"We have the best class of traveling salesmen," they said, "Carter's ink, Dennison—all the best." Fur shop showing squirrel and the latest narrow-striped muskrats and fox. High-heeled, dainty, brilliant-buckled shoes, gowns of ivory or flame-colored georgette, smart hats with matching patterned scarfs in the windows. "These girls think nothing of coming in here and buying a hundred and fifty dollar coat-suit," a merchant said. A big new hotel lined with creamy stone, with softly-toned woodwork, mezzanine lounge in rich blues, nice prints, ballroom with its crystal, banquet room and perfect service. There meet the Rotary and Kiwanis. On Armistice Day the Legion turned out from its headquarters across the way, headed by two large bands, very effective in their white and blue capes. They were the bands of the two local high schools. One of these schools alone has about 1,200 students.

Hazleton is unique among the anthracite cities. Shenandoah, Mahanoy City are less beautiful, more crowded, more "foreign." But it is nevertheless a coal city. Its population is of the mines. And therefore, away from that street of shops, with its theaters—also crowded after eight weeks of the strike—lead narrow, undistinguished streets of "homes." Little houses, postage-stamps of houses, with heavily upholstered "suites" crowding the most expensive kind of radio sets, a dining-room constantly wearing its white cloth over the table, line these streets.

You do not see expensive goods by the yard in the shops. You seldom see a sewing-machine in the houses. But the young lady of the house will be wearing the newest of frocks, the gayest of sport stockings. It is America!

The furs are not sables or ermine, but they are furs. The cars in the street are not Rolls-Royce and Pierce, but they are cars.

It is interesting to speculate upon the operators' point of view when the question of wage negotiations arises, familiar as they are with this background. But should we or would we have it otherwise if we could? Is it our determination that "Americanization" shall be confined to courses in our schools, or shall it be a thing of its own growth, producing extravagant blossoms of a not altogether lovely kind at first, perhaps, but eventually by its own mistakes flowering into something really fine? Anyway, we cannot stop it. It is imitative of what it sees and quickly so.

The men bewildered—and therefore the hardest to deal with—of superiors and of superintendents are those who are most benevolent. A few of the coal families keep old homesteads near the mines and live in them occasionally. In spite of the new ways these families preserve their somewhat feudal point of view about their men, and the men still have, in those few cases, a little of the feudal allegiance somewhere deep down in their sympathies. One of these families once built a road many miles long across a certain ridge, where the grandmamma of the present owner and her sister and her friends would drive in their carriage and pair. It was a very convenient road, linking two excellent patches of rabbit-country without a detour of some miles for the foot-farer and the men used to like to short-cut by it. Every now and then one of them would be thrown off or perhaps even arrested for "trespass." Now it is a public road, frequently used. It is a symbol.

Article 13

By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

AIRPLANES, submarines, dreadnoughts; Big Berthas, tanks, poison gases. With such damnable contraptions have the confounded scientists spoiled man's supreme sport—the thrilling, the 100 per cent patriotic, soul-stirring, glorious game of war. They have ruined war because they have made it so expensive a luxury that you lose even if you win. Witness the lean pocket-books of France, Italy, even England.

Horatio at the Bridge; Washington Crossing the Delaware; Gettysburg, Thermopylae, Richard Coeur de Lion; Don't Shoot, Boys, Till You See the Whites of Their Eyes. Is it possible that a machine-run world is to substitute for such splendors the tiresome decisions of a dull World Court?

But let us not despair. The World Court is perhaps not so toothless an affair as may be supposed. There is the nice question of enforcing the court's decisions. In the answer to that query there still resides a hope for something more vivid than the deadly arguments of prolix lawyers in a sleepy courtroom.

I have before me an essay by Professor Manley O. Hudson, Bemis Professor of International Law in the Harvard Law School, in which the professor, arguing for the existing World Court, attempts to demolish Senator Borah. But does he succeed? Discussing the World Court as now existing and functioning, he writes:

> The World Court is related to the League only in that (1) the expenses of both are paid out of a common budget; (2) the judges are elected by the Assembly and Council of the League; and (3) the court may give advisory opinions when requested by the Council or Assembly.

Is that statement of his quite complete? Is not the Court a closer relative of the League than his statement indicates? Is not the World Court established pursuant to the Covenant of the League of Nations? If so, how about Article 13? The pertinent parts of that article declare:

> The members of the League agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration or judicial settlement . . . they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration or judicial settlement.

So far, so good, if jurisdiction is made dependent upon acquiescence of sovereign states. But the able gentlemen who drafted the Covenant did not stop there. Some of them, at least, were practical statesmen. What would be the good of a court with power to decide if there is no power to enforce? This was evidently in the minds of some of the draftsmen of the Covenant.

Hence Article 13 has something to say on this subject of enforcement:

> The members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the League which complies therewith.

The italics are mine. Since the members agree that they will not resort to war against a complying member, what will they do to a member who does not comply with the decision? Make war? What other implication can reasonably be gathered from the words? But if it be needed to make the matter clearer, let me quote the last sentence of Article 13:

> In the event of any failure to carry out such an award or decision the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Does this mean that the Council shall have power to cause the League members to make war against the non-complying member? If not, what does it mean? What does that word "steps" mean? And how about the word "failure"? The language is "in the event of any failure, etc.," not "in the event of any refusal, etc." Suppose a nation fails to comply with a decision solely because it is financially or physically unable to do so. Is the Council nevertheless to have the power of life and death over that nation?

But the matter does not end here. Article 16 declares:

> Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the League or not.

Thus it appears that the whole power of the League and of every League member is invoked against any nation which resorts to war in violation of Article 13; and since the World Court is created to carry out the provisions of that article, I take the liberty of asking Professor Hudson whether his statement quoted above is quite complete.

The fact seems to me to be that the World Court is not only joined with the Covenant like a Siamese twin but is backed by the whole power of the League and its members.

What of it, you may ask? Just this. Ordinary courts have sheriffs and marshals attached to them to levy judgments, execute warrants of arrest and dispossess, writs of replevin, etc. But when you come to a World Court, your sheriff—if there is to be one—is an army; and if Article 13 means what plain words indicate, the army behind the World Court would be one ordered into the field by the Council of the League.

Again what of it? You may ask whether a court having power to decide but none to enforce is worth the bother of bringing it into being. Would such an emasculated court be of any use? But that's another story, a story which will appear in The Nation next week. Meantime, I, who am an enthusiast for a world court—a court of justice, backed not by arms but only by acquiescence and a decent respect for the opinion of mankind, ask the champions of the existing court as now constituted and functioning to tell us whether Article 13 means what I have gathered from its words.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has a hard time keeping up with his colleagues on The Nation. He disagrees with them so often and so thoroughly that sometimes a statement of theirs gets by him because he is too busy contradicting what they have said the week before. For example, there was the misguided opinion, advanced a month or two ago, that "slush" in journalism was a new departure, that it was unknown in the good old days. As proof of the contrary, he is glad to offer the following, which appeared in a Dublin paper of May 30, 1784, a description of the first appearance on the Dublin stage of that pearl of womanhood, Mrs. Siddons:

> From the repeated panegyrics in the impartial London newspapers, we were taught to expect the sight of a heavenly angel; but how were we supernaturally surprised into the most awful joy at beholding a mortal goddess! The house was crowded with hundreds more than it could hold—with thousands of admiring spectators that went away without a sight. This extraordinary phenomenon of tragic excellence! This star of Melpomene! This comet of the stage! This sun of the firmament of the Muses! This moon of blank verse! This empress of the pistol and dagger! This chaos of Shakespeare! This world of weeping clouds! This Juno of commanding aspects! This Terpsichore of the curtains and scenes! This Proserpine of fire and earthquake! This Katterfelto of wonders exceeded expectation, went beyond belief, and soared above all the natural powers of description! She was nature itself! She was the most exquisite work of art! She was the very daisy, primrose, tuberose, sweetbriar, furze-blossom, gilliflower, wallflower, cauliflower, auricula, and rosemary! In short, she was the bouquet of Parnassus. Where expectation was raised so high it was thought she would be injured by her appearance; but it was the audience who was injured; several fainted before the curtain drew up!

ONE gathers that it was an unusual occasion, to say the least. Evidently we have no such actresses nowadays, or if we have, our audiences are more calloused, for the Drifter avows that in all his long life he has never seen such a scene as is further described in the Dublin reporter's lyric burst:

> When she came to the scene of parting with her wedding ring, ah! what a sight was there. . . . One hundred and nine ladies fainted, forty-six went into fits, and ninety-five had string hysterics! The world will scarcely credit the truth when they are told that fourteen children, [illegible] old women, one hundred tailors, and six common councilmen were actually drowned in the inundation of tears that flowed from the galleries, the slips and the lower to increase the briny pond in the pit. The water was three feet deep and the people were obliged to stand on the benches and in that position were up to the ankles in tears. An Act of Parliament against her playing two more will certainly pass!

THE Drifter challenges his colleagues to produce any example of modern newspaper hyperbole to compare with this. But lest it be said that this, after all, was only mock-serious, he is glad to quote from the Washington Capital's story of the assassination of President Garfield. Here was no room for burlesque, but a most solemn occasion.

> The late Czar, when fired at before the Nihilist bomb blew him into eternity, shrieked and fainted with terror. The phlegmatic Emperor of Germany never recovered the shock of a slight wound from birdshot fired so far off that it would scarcely have killed a reed-bird. But the President of the American republic, with a bullet as large as that of a Remington rifle tearing through his vitals, sets his teeth without a shudder and says: "I'll chance and I'll win!" and softening his face into the sweetness of a lover's smile, whispers to his dear wife as she kneels beside him: "Sweetheart, have no fear; I'll pull through!" Such heroism, such manhood, cause the blood to surge in the heart of every American!

* * * * *

TODAY this sort of thing simply does not happen. We have our own type of "slush," but nothing so soul-compelling or heart-wringing as this. There are times when even the Drifter believes that the world is moving in the right direction.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

America, the League, and Syria

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your statement in The Nation of November 4 that "if the League measured up to its job it would order France out of Syria at once" seems to me to mistake entirely the nature of the League itself. The League is not a super-state. It is not a political entity. It is not a power in itself. It is simply a method of doing business. It is a machinery for co-operation between fifty-five governments of the world. Now, if you say that these fifty-five governments should order France out of Syria, your proposition becomes a very different one. The fifty-five only act unanimously in using the machinery which we call the League. The fifty-four have not been given power to order the fifty-fifth out. Few of the fifty-five governments feel special responsibility with reference to Syria. Most of them feel about it much as our government does.

But you will say that Syria is under a League mandate. You are obviously forgetting recent history when you say that "the League gave the mandate to France." It was the Allied and Associated Powers which allocated Syria to France, though the Council of the League of Nations approved the mandate. The United States participated in the allocation. American armies helped in the victory which made it possible. An Amer[illegible]

But fifty-five governments, not including that of the United States, are maintaining a method of getting regular accounting with reference to these mandated territories. The Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations was meeting in Geneva last week. It received petitions from Syria and at once asked France for a report concerning same. It will [illegible] meeting in February to consider France's report. The meeting will air the facts and give world opinion a rallying point, at any rate. Meanwhile, what share of responsibility is the United States taking? And one reason why it takes none is that The Nation has grasped every opportunity to attack this cooperative method of handling international affairs.

You speak of "the men who see in the League the panacea for the world's ills." I do not know any practical people who take such a view. Of course there are a few enthusiasts who misrepresent the League, precisely as there are critics who constantly misrepresent it. But why do you allow yourself to flare at the extremists? Why not see the League of Nations as it is: namely, a machinery, a method of taking common counsel about common interests—not a new political being but a new symbol of cooperation? Of course the League as a method will not always be used in cases of international difficulties. Of course it will not be used as frequently as you and I should like to have it used. We even dislike at times the action of the Congress of the United States. You admit that the League method was usefully employed in the Greek-Bulgarian case. Why not welcome the method for the possibility of its use in some cases where fifty-five states are willing to use it? In other cases, why not blame the governments of the world rather than the method which they do not use? And in blaming them, don't forget your own government, which almost never uses this method, partly because you object to its doing so.

The difficulty with The Nation seems to me to be that it has allowed the League to be greatly oversold to it. You expect the impossible. Why not see it as it is? And if you would, I think your criticism should first be leveled against the attitude of the Government of the United States, which in common with fifty-four governments that are in the League of Nations is not proposing to throw France out of Syria.

Cambridge, Mass., November 4 MANLEY O. HUDSON

Capital Punishment

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of October 21 I read: "A total of 288 murders in 279 days in Cook County would seem to indicate that as a deterrent capital punishment was somewhat lacking." Now, according to recent statistics, out of 180 murders there in 1924, only one accused has been hanged. Some perverse people will think that what is needed in Chicago is a few hangings. From Cleveland comes the following: "There were 205 murders in the last three years, but only two persons were sentenced to death, and their cases are still pending." One would hardly say that in these two great cities, which are fairly typical, capital punishment exists.

As is well known, the number of murders in all England, a vast scene of hunger and unemployment, falls far below that of any great American city. Those obstinate English almost invariably hang the accused. In Canada, notwithstanding its "wild west," murders are extremely rare. There too a bad habit of hanging. And so in Australia and New Zealand, with all their wildernesses.

The fault, it is said, is in society. Yes, but in several respects. Society has in this country been too lenient. During my lifetime I have seen one law after another passed to make ruffians more comfortable in prison and to soften or shorten their punishment—the parole laws, the indeterminate sentence, the improvement of prisons, and the showering of pardons, while European governments have remained as stern as ever—yet the number of violent crimes among us has not diminished. Signor Ferri is cited. Now, in Latin countries the bulk of murders are from emotional causes, and I am one of those who believe that in this country, also, it is useless to pass death statutes against such as murder out of passion. What I believe can be and must be enforced is the death penalty against those who murder to get money, a class increasing with terrible rapidity. In Italy it will be noticed that when they had to deal with just that class, they put them to death. When the Italian Government finally decided to break up the Mafia, they used rough methods, and crimes of this class of criminals disappeared.

It will be noticed that in Northern Europe the street and house bandit is practically unknown. Why? Over there his business does not pay. Here it does. When I was a boy the bandit was practically unknown in the Eastern States. Why has he multiplied so terribly? In America his business pays.

What is going on in our country now is a guerrilla warfare against society by bandits. Surely few people would deny the right of our soldiery or police to shoot into thugs and kill them if they came in an army, bent upon assault, murder, and robbery. Yet what we have to face in this country is about the same thing. The thugs do not come upon us in armies but as guerrillas or snipers. The chances today of any extreme penalty are very small, and these rascals know it. When they are hanged after crimes, as in Canada, England, and Northern Europe, they at least content themselves with larceny and leave us our lives.

Wilful persons commit crimes for money when they see that the worst penalty is a short term in a comfortable prison, besides a good chance of not being punished at all and a still better chance of being speedily released from prison by weeping ladies and gentlemen who have not yet been shot.

Those who, because hanging does not deter some kinds of murderers, think it deters none defy common sense. They resemble those who still deny that vaccination ever arrested smallpox.

From "Kiver to Kiver"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is only one thing a university student should do with The Nation, read it from "kiver" to "kiver." It pays.

In the last year I have read it entire, except Bertrand Russell on relativity and the articles on China. Now I'm hunting up my old copies of The Nation for supplementary reading on relativity for a philosophy class and to write a paper on the Chinese situation for a course in Oriental politics.

Those who neglect The Nation neglect a valuable source of pertinent information.

Can Any One Help Her?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you be good enough to tell me something that I can use in the opening exercises of my third-grade class, in place of the salute to the flag?

Almost all the pupils in the room are children of overworked, underpaid laborers, and I feel not only guilty but ridiculous at hearing the pathetic daily repetition: "One nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

I am twenty-one years old and very ignorant.

Deirdre

By HELENE MULLINS

I have not heard a lovelier tale than this:
How once Queen Deirdre, cruelly betrayed,
Turned from her lover's tender lips to kiss
The lips of death, and how on her was laid
The earth's dark quilt, who should have slept beneath
Delicate laces nuns went blind to make;
And none brought praise to her, nor queenly wreath,
But tears or curses, for her lover's sake.

This is a tale that poets love to tell
When they are drunk with beauty; and I go
Among the wise men who have loved her well,
And learn from them the sad strange things they know;
Learn of the tall young lover and the king
Who hated him, and of the haughty way
In which Queen Deirdre died, and everything
Is beautiful and gracious that they say.

First Glance

CHINESE drama in one form or another is something like four thousand years old, but there is no history of it either in China or elsewhere. For his volume on "The Chinese Theater" (Little, Brown: $7.50) Mr. A. E. Zucker consequently was forced to rely upon scattered articles and books, and it may be said to his credit that he remains under no illusion as to the completeness of his record. There are inevitable gaps in it—gaps which Mr. Zucker hopes that he will inspire someone to fill. Yet it is both an informing and an amusing record, and certain circumstances combine to make Mr. Zucker's book one of distinct value for the American audience to which he has addressed it. Mr. Zucker was familiar with the Peking theater over a period of five years, during which time he took notes, interviewed actors, playwrights, and critics, and in general applied himself to an art for which he had already an affection. A student of comparative European literature, he was better equipped than most visitors in China to decide what was unique about her drama and what about it had interesting analogues in the drama of the West. More important still, he had a sense of humor and an eye for the genuinely picturesque; it is these qualities, joined with a pleasant if respectful curiosity, which make "The Chinese Theater" on the whole so satisfactory. Mr. Zucker has connected and explained the stray morsels of fact which had been the food of our understanding until now. He has pried behind the strangest of the conventions and demonstrated that after all they are not so strange; or if some of them do indeed happen to be strange he has given us the full color of their charm. It is his distinction in general to have brought a distant subject close.

The chief reason for Mr. Zucker's success in this latter direction is his conviction, decidedly borne out by the evidence which everywhere he presents, that the Chinese theater is China in a nutshell—it is in China herself, apparently, that Mr. Zucker finds himself most interested. Between the walls of a Peking or a Shanghai playhouse, he points out, we can become acquainted with "the old legends of the nation, the famous novels read by the masses, intrigues such as occur on every hand, the music of the various provinces, and the moral ideals of the four hundred millions in general. . . . We see the corruption of officials, the callousness toward suffering, the selfishness of parents, the eagerness for compromise, and the lack of physical or moral courage; on the other hand, we see the polite civilization with its long tradition, the respect for the past and for learning, the love of poetry and art, the general kindliness and honesty of the people, the love of humor, the extreme democracy in social relations, and the reasonableness and lack of fanaticism." These happen also to be my own concerns. So that while I am grateful to Mr. Zucker for his sketch of Chinese dramatic history, for his expert summaries of certain famous plays, for his elucidation of the conventions, for his interview with Mei Lan-fang, China's greatest actor, for his account of the laborious discipline to which all actors are submitted, and for his remarks upon the new Europeanized drama, I am particularly indebted to him for the clearest picture I have ever been given of a Chinese institution in the flesh. This is the theater itself as he describes it—noise, dirt, cold, and all—in the first few pages of his sixth chapter. There is as much beauty in these pages as there is in the paintings on silk which adorn other sections of the book; and there is quite as much China, I suspect, as is to be found in libraries of official reports.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Industrial Revolution Reconsidered

Industrial Society in England Towards the End of the Eighteenth Century. By Witt Bowden. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

IN this lucid and scholarly monograph Mr. Bowden makes important contributions to our knowledge of the beginnings of modern industrialism. The period to which he has given intensive study is that in which machine technique established itself in the leading industries of England and demonstrated its competitive superiority to older systems of industrial production—approximately the three decades following 1760. As the title of the book indicates, it is with the social, not the technical, aspects of the Industrial Revolution that the author is concerned, with the social factors behind the changes in industrial processes and with the social readjustments that followed those changes, not with the new technique itself. Diligent researches in a wide range of sources, some results of which Mr. Bowden has published previously, have enabled him to throw new light upon many phases of the economic and social transformations in which contemporary civilization has its origin.

After presenting impressive evidences of the spirit of mechanical invention which characterized English society in the latter decades of the eighteenth century, the author passes in review a number of conditions that have been regarded as causes of the inventions. Many circumstances, he concludes, were favorable for mechanical improvements.

But the "determining factor" was "the opportunity for the profitable use of mechanical inventions." This opportunity was afforded by the extraordinary demand for commodities, and he thinks that it was "in respect to the demand for English goods that the eighteenth century differed most radically from earlier periods." Behind every historical event or movement there is always, of course, a complex of antecedents that may have been influential in causing it, but the student of history would do well to recognize the fact that there is no means of ascertaining which of these antecedents had a determining influence. We cannot reset the stage of history, call back the actors and repeat the performance, eliminating one antecedent after another and recording the differences in the outcome; which amounts to saying that history is not and cannot be made an exact science. It cannot be established that Mr. Bowden's "determining factor" was in reality a causa causans; it should be presented merely as one element in his "complex of forces."

Study of primary sources has led the author to a number of conclusions at variance with opinions that have been more or less generally accepted. One of these opinions is that contemporaries were unconscious of the economic transformation which accompanied the use of the new machines. Devotees of "pure" literature do seem to have been amazingly blind to what was going on in the vulgar realm of work, but outside of this chaste circle many writers, Mr. Bowden shows, were aware of the momentous character of the economic changes, which they characterized as "extraordinary," "astonishing," "almost miraculous," and "unparalleled in the annals of the world." It is clear that to many contemporaries they seemed revolutionary. Most rapid and most astonishing to observers was the transformation in the cotton industry.

In its beginnings, during the period under consideration, the new industrialism exhibited most of its later characteristics. The early English free-trade movement of the late eighteenth century has generally been regarded as a product of economic theory rather than of economic interests and in this respect different from that of the later Manchester school. Mr. Bowden takes sharp issue with this view and gives evidence to show that the manufacturers of the eighteenth century who had adopted the new machine technique were the true fathers of free trade. According to Adam Smith the manufacturers of his day were dominated by the spirit of monopoly and protectionism, but the author shows that he failed to take account of the transformation already in progress which was turning the new manufacturers into champions of free trade. On this point, however, some of Adam Smith's contemporaries showed more insight than he did, and attributed to the new manufacturers an attitude toward commerce practically identical with that of the great industrialists of the days of Cobden and Bright. The former, in their desire for cheap raw materials and for a lowering of English import duties as a means of enlarging their foreign markets, as well as in their attacks on the Corn Laws and the Navigation Laws, clearly foreshadow the Manchester school. The Anglo-French commercial treaty of 1786, the first step taken by Great Britain in the direction of free trade, was regarded at the time as a great victory for those branches of English manufacture in which the new inventions had been adopted.

But while force of circumstance was rapidly transforming the new manufacturers into champions of economic liberalism, they seem to have been uninterested in political liberalism. Unlike their successors of the nineteenth century they were indifferent to parliamentary reform. Complaints that the new industrial centers were not represented in parliament did not come from the manufacturers, who apparently prided themselves upon their lack of interest in political questions. Like the townsmen of the Middle Ages they wished to be let alone to pursue their economic activities. They did not hesitate, however, to bring pressure to bear upon the government when their personal interests were involved, and the General Chamber of Manufacturers of Great Britain, organized in 1785, the precursor of a host of similar associations in later times, was able to exert decisive influence on parliament and the ministry in matters of taxation and commercial policy.

In a very informing chapter on the workers in the new industries Mr. Bowden addresses himself to the problem of explaining why the introduction of machinery, which led to such an enormous increase in the production of commodities, did not produce a marked and permanent improvement in the status of the laboring population, why the prospect of social betterment for the masses which the new inventions opened up was not realized. He rejects the theory that the wretchedness of the new industrial proletariat was caused by unemployment resulting from a displacement of labor by labor-saving machines, and shows that contemporary observers were in agreement that the spread of machinery led to an actual increase of employment. They agreed, also, that the economic condition of the new laborers, in the early period of industrialism, was superior to that of older groups of workers; for example, there was less pauperism in the new industrial towns than in the rural parishes. Mr. Bowden's examination of conditions on the farms and in the older industries, from which the new proletariat was recruited, shatters completely the romantic conception of a merry England on the eve of the Industrial Revolution, tenanted by sturdy, self-respecting peasants and independent craftsmen inspired by the instinct of workmanship. Conditions on the farms, as to wages, housing conditions, continuity of employment, and hygiene, were bad in the extreme, and in the old "domestic system" of manufacturing wages were being forced down below the level of subsistence.

The tragedy of the Industrial Revolution, as Mr. Bowden sees it, was lack of social control for the common welfare. The government was dominated by aristocratic conceptions of labor and, while adopting a policy of laissez-faire for the employing and propertied classes, placed new restraints upon the workers. The "public," in the language of the day, did not include the masses, and a fecund and poverty-stricken working class was supposed to be the necessary basis of "national" prosperity. For this traditional, aristocratic attitude toward labor, as Mr. Bowden points out, the landlords were more responsible than the new "lords" of industry. Under such circumstances the industrial workers could not look to government for protection, and it is the author's opinion that they failed to work out their own salvation because they came from sources that were polluted and suffered from the "blight of inferiority."

Vagabonds

Dark Laughter. By Sherwood Anderson. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

WHEN one thinks of the contemporary commentators upon the American scene the names of Messrs. Sinclair Lewis and Sherwood Anderson come naturally to mind, and yet it is a curious fact that though these names are so frequently linked the men themselves belong to the two different classes into which all societies are divided. The mass of any population is composed of those whose nature it is to play, as it were, the game. They clear the forests when forests are to be cleared, they build the industries when industries are to be built, they catch the rhythm of the step when their comrades march away to war; and in whatever world they happen to be they definitely, in the words of the Hairy Ape, "belong." Mr. Lewis, by virtue of his peculiarly American vigor, of his zeal, and of his positive, confident determination, is a member, in so far as any artist can be, of this group; for satirist though he be his participation in the life of his time is active and enthusiastic. But there is another class, composed, like every class of big men and little men alike, of those who are the vagabonds of body or of mind. The spirit of their own or of any age seems never to grip them; they do not understand the value set by their fellows upon the prizes for which the races are run; and in the midst of the bustle they stand wondering by. When one of them charms us we call him a dreamer and when one, vaguely ineffectual in the performance of some task we have set him, moves our anger we call him shiftless; but we know the class to which they all belong—they are the moonstruck ones who seem never able to share the unquestioning faith in the worth of this or that which keeps the others so intent on their pursuit of wealth, of fame, of respectability, and of comfort. The most articulate and the most self-conscious of the class write the dreamy poems, essays, and novels which fascinate without ever deeply entering into readers in whom the will is more dominant; but even in the midst of the busy American civilization one may see the lower ranks of the order who have calmly detached themselves from the hurly-burly and are sitting, perhaps, by the banks of some stream into whose waters they are contentedly dangling lines never yet bitten by fish.

That Mr. Anderson's father was such a one Mr. Anderson revealed by the delightful picture which he drew in "A Story Teller's Story," and that he is himself his father's son grown sophisticated and self-conscious his own novels confess. The old man who could always find some excuse to leave his family behind and wander about the country fascinating the inhabitants of lonely farms by the resplendent and lying tales which he could so readily imagine is the true begetter of the novelist Anderson, for he too, when he lets his fancy wander, can form the most delightful of day dreams. But partly because he happens to have been born in an age but little inclined to yield to the charm of fancy and partly because he has become too sophisticated naively to indulge the day-dreaming faculty, he holds himself in check and describes rather the deeds and the souls of those who, like himself, belong to that moonstruck class whose members find themselves temperamentally alien to the orderly and busy world in which they happen to have been born. The hero of "Dark Laughter" is such a one, and though he has a story—the story of how he escaped from the routine life into which he did not fit, how he wandered dreaming here and there in search of he knew not what, and how finally, with fitting irony, he stole the wife of a respectable though unexciting manufacturer while the latter was taking part in an Armistice Day parade—this story has actually neither beginning nor end, and the charm of the book lies in the author's evocation of the vagabond mood.

Anderson is not a deep thinker, and it is one of the absurd results of the conventional thought-pattern of our age that he is taken seriously as a critic of society; but he is, nevertheless, a poet who feels things deeply in his own particular way. His characters live chiefly by virtue of that part of them which is himself; certainly his two most vivid personages in the present book—the hero himself and that middle-aged fellow-workman of his who is accustomed from time to time to slip away for a night with his wife and a bottle of whiskey, ostensibly to fish, but really to lie in the moonlight by the river and feel himself as free as an animal from the thoughts and responsibilities of man—are vivid because of the extent to which their mood is his own; and he is best of all when he is communicating to the reader by delicate exposition, by vivid picture, or in Whitmanesque prose-poems that soft, vague reverie, too little definite to be called thought, which all have known in some moment of summer idleness but which is the natural mood of those who are born like himself to drift gently through life. In many a passage of "Dark Laughter," especially in those which describe the life along the river, he has caught it with a nearly flawless art, and realizing that it is an attitude to be felt rather than a philosophy to be intellectually defended or understood he has wisely refrained from argument and left it to be symbolized by that mellow, careless laughter with which the Negroes, the perfect vagabonds, greet the situations over which those of another race puzzle their heads and search their hearts. There are some who choose to breast a current, but there are others who find it sweeter to drift dreaming downstream.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Why Social Conflict?

Races, Nations, and Classes. By Herbert Adolphus Miller. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $2.

IN an admirably concise yet astutely tentative introduction Mr. Miller rests a thesis. Emotionally, modern man is still pretty much at the Cro-Magnon level. The élan in our élan vital is mostly the coeval savage ancestor within us, who with cunning ferocity resents the constant pressure of a social and economic culture which demands his civilization. Hence the abyss that frightens the Great Society into the nervous disease which it now is. This fright shows itself in numberless rationalizations: an irrelevant religious "modernism," which would "reconcile" science and religion; "social engineering" schemes, which do not touch the sore spots of competitive production; jesuitical panaceas such as Fascism, the Klan, "Americanization." These "anxiety neuroses" show themselves, according to Mr. Miller, in "superstitions" which explain fear in terms of bigotry and in "pseudo-science," a more sophisticated form of superstition in which the half-educated take out their maladjustment, sneaking in under the modern prestige of science and imputing to it a melioristic magic which it neither does nor should possess.

In his outlook and terminology Mr. Miller quite clearly accepts the psychoanalytic approach to social problems. This, of course, is not novel. His novelty lies in his effort to develop his position persuasively rather than strictly, thus guarding it against pedantic controversy. Nowhere is he officiously "scientific." Nowhere does he make the "social discovery" that social antagonisms would disappear of themselves under technical "community organization." He knows the epistemology of bona fide science too well to fall for this meretricious neo-Spencerian uplift. He knows that sociology must never contradict science, which is all that science demands of social philosophy. Accordingly he prefers to sift his vast sociological experience not on the basis of true-or-false but on the far more relevant basis of wise-or-foolish. And Mr. Miller's mind is a very shrewd sieve, which makes these 191 compact little pages deliciously quotable at random.

Our instinctive life, in its ambivalence, tends to struggle as well as to cooperate. Modern psychology does not claim that conflict can be completely "sublimated" into collaboration—which is the romantic fallacy of the professional brokers of social conflict in church, college, and philanthropy. But Mr. Miller does feel that society must learn to struggle about present realities and not about emotional fixations carried over from geological antiquity. Today the great social conflicts are almost altogether atavistic. Look at the agenda of the League of Nations: To what degree is it permissible for Great Britain to poison China with Indian opium? What is the least offensive method of fleecing the German workers for Germany's sole "guilt"? Is the "mandate" the most humane technique of imperial brigandage? To compromise with these savageries is but to "suppress" them still deeper into the unconscious of social forces. They must be faced and fought. And Mr. Miller proceeds to do so in one of the most mercilessly searching and objective analyses which such conflicts have yet received in contemporary social psychology.

He divides these conflicts into two major groups. Race (a convenient anthropological hypothesis), religion (a relic of primitive man's fear of reality, as troublesome as the vermiform appendix), and nationality (a useful geo-cultural conception) form the three "vertical" groups of conflict. Class and caste are the "horizontal" groups. Then he proceeds to illustrate the cross-collisions of these conflict groups. He takes the reader through the Dr. Caligari asylum of Central Europe. He diagnoses the psychosis of anti-Semitism. He analyzes the "white man's burden" of colorphobia. He shows the maniacal variety of patriotism as distinct from the natural affection for one's own culture group. And every time he bares the effects of these "oppression psychoses" on the oppressors, who rationalize their tyranny into "superiority," and on the oppressed, whose psychiatry shows all the symptoms of the inferiority complex.

This is by far the best job in the very creditable Lippincott series of sociology. The only thing that mars it is Professor Hayes's "editorial introduction." Professor Hayes bitterly hates the Russian revolution, whose "pathological character . . . has [been] demonstrated." After this "Ceterum censeo Russiam esse delendam" he recommends this book, though it expressly blames all revolution on reaction. Mr. Miller "makes an important contribution," according to his editor, "toward the comprehension" that "social interaction, the causal efficiency of human relationship, is the predominant factor in securing both order and progress." Whether Mr. Miller does so or not this reviewer is unable to tell, for he finds Professor Hayes's English incomprehensible. But if the latter had read the typescript of the book carefully he might have learned that Mr. Miller "made an important contribution toward the comprehension" of academic cuttlefish who emit an inkburst of verbiage whenever they are frightened by social forces beyond their understanding. BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Books in Brief

Words and Idioms. By Logan Pearsall Smith. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

Under this title Mr. Smith has collected five pleasant, scholarly essays that dilute for the general reader some of the vast materials stored in the "New English Dictionary" and the other great lexicons. English Sea Terms discusses the varied sources from which the technical vocabulary of the English seaman has been drawn; The English Element in Foreign Languages traces some of the words that, taken over bodily or translated more or less literally, have got into other languages, particularly into German and French. Four Romantic Words follows the picaresque career of four critical terms—romantic, originality, creative, and genius—from the mid-seventeenth to the early nineteenth century. There are also a somewhat vapid essay on dialect and standard speech and a rich and suggestive collection, filling nearly half the book, of English idioms and figurative expressions.

The Tragic Life of Vincent Van Gogh. By Louis Piérard. Translated by Herbert Garland. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

After Meier-Graefe's incomparable life of Van Gogh, which gives the very body and pressure of the painter's genius, any biography of the man seems presumptuous. Measured against the German volumes, the English version of which is in itself a high accomplishment, Mr. Piérard's book is a halt and stammering affair. But for those of us who cannot afford Meier-Graefe, this succinct account of Van Gogh's tragic history must serve. The author was apparently at pains to make contacts with those who remembered Van Gogh, and visited with eager piety the various odd corners of Europe which were the stations of the painter's cross. The fact that the mining center of Le Borinage, where Van Gogh preached during 1878 and 1879, is M. Piérard's native place, considerably helped this biographer in the reconstruction of that period. Nevertheless his work wants that burning glow, that sullen intensity which must always associate themselves with Van Gogh's name. The awkwardness of the translation is not a little responsible for the lack one feels here. The twenty-four reproductions of the painter's work go a good way toward redeeming the book.

Letters on the American Revolution, 1774-1776. Edited by Margaret Wheeler Willard. Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50. Letters from America, 1776-1779. Being Letters of Brunswick, Hessian, and Waldeck Officers with the British Armies During the Revolution. Translated by Ray W. Pettengill. Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50.

It was a happy thought of Mrs. Willard's to make a selection of letters written from America and published in the British newspapers between 1774 and 1776. Moore's "Diary of the Revolution" (1865) was an early attempt to use like material and is still useful; but Mrs. Willard's collection is not only useful but readable, and it is well edited. The writers add little to our knowledge of the difference with the mother country and the military operations; they do bring into prominence personal features and give a natural expression of individual convictions. Many of the letters are from merchants or factors visiting the colonies for a special purpose, and they reflect impressions rather than convictions. The messages from besieged Boston and New York under the threat of occupation are good history. Only one letter is signed—that of the Bradfords, printers—and the reader is often piqued to realize how successful has been the caution to conceal the writers, whether in army, navy, or civil life. Reputations for sanity in a time of madness could be made if only some clue to the writers were given. The second work has less novelty, for the Hessian letters have already been translated, though imperfectly, from Schlözer's "Briefwechsel." Mr. Pettengill gives a smoother and better rendering. The more interesting letters are those on the Burgoyne expedition written by one who was intelligent and observant. He gives an excellent account of the conditions encountered in Canada and of the march to the final catastrophe.

Social Struggles and Socialist Forerunners. By M. Beer. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

It is an adage that the "social problem" is never solved. This third volume in a well-known author's comprehensive history of socialism and social struggles not only illustrates the adage but raises in the reader's mind the query whether socialism itself will not shortly appear as another phase of that endless class conflict which he here traces through peasant revolts, religious upheavals, political revolutions, and economic crises with their attendant utopian dreams from the end of the Middle Ages to the early nineteenth century.

The Greatest Book in the World and Other Papers. By A. Edward Newton. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

Another miscellany by the man who has made book-collecting in America almost a parlor game. The papers are best which stick most closely to the subjects of bibliography and collecting.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Art

Dorothea Dreier

THE reception given the current exhibition of paintings by the late Dorothea Dreier at the Worcester Art Museum recalls the approbation accorded these paintings when they were displayed last year at the Brooklyn Museum and when the press and the public were so generous in their praise of a gifted American painter who during her lifetime was so engrossed in her art and so modest concerning her achievements as to shun general admiration. It was not until nearly two years after her death that her sister, Miss Katherine Dreier, decided to bring this work to public notice. Criticism has proved that she was right in her judgment; the collection will go from Worcester to various cities throughout the country.

The fact that Dorothea Dreier had tired of the academic and sought to record her subjects in the broader, more emotional manner long before modernism became known as such showed her independence of thought, her originality and alertness of mind. Her selflessness in portraying her subjects and her disinclination to exploit her talents in the every-day manner brought rare results in structural design and helped her to achieve the spiritual aspect of beauty as she saw it. She was versatile in her choice of themes and painted in various places—in Holland, Switzerland, New York, the Adirondacks, the White Mountains, and at Riverdale, New York, catching the spirit of each with sympathy and understanding.

Her experiences were wide, and devoting almost her entire life to art, working out problems with a mind that was as intellectual as it was artistic, she gained headway beyond that of the average painter. As early as 1908, when most painters were following the then popular schools of purely intellectual trend and at broadest were succumbing to impressionism, Dorothea Dreier was abandoning prescribed rules for the breadth of vision which was leading her toward the modernist movement. Yet in the true sense of the word she was not a modernist, but rather, as Louis Lozowick says, "a link between the older romantic lyrical period now disintegrating—as shown in her landscapes—and the newer, neo-realist, epic period still in the process of formation—made evident in her cityscapes." It was as though she thought mainly of the creative importance of a subject and executed it in the manner best suited to her temperament regardless of schools or teachings.

Dorothea Dreier was born in Brooklyn in 1870 and died in 1923. Her first instructors were William M. Chase, John R. Twachtman, and Walter Shirlaw, and it was the last named whom she came to recognize as her master. Yet there is no reflection of any of these teachers in her work, since, following the advice of Shirlaw who soon recognized her individuality, she steadfastly adhered to her personal manner. When later she traveled abroad with a view to settling in the country which most strongly appealed to her sympathies it was Holland that she finally selected, and at Laren she painted many of her best pictures. Born to wealth and luxury, she nevertheless devoted her talents to recording the humble Dutch workers. Their hardy physiques, their strenuous occupations, and the simplicity of their lives would quite naturally appeal to one as free from the sentimentalities that govern the average woman as she was. Everything she painted in Holland reflects the enthusiasm with which she undertook her studies of these workers. She depicted them at their tasks with a realism not untinged with poetry, and she made no attempt to present them, as so many American painters have done, amid beautiful flowers and in glowing sunlight—looking clean and contented. She showed them at their looms, suggesting subtly the dust and lint that enveloped them; their faces betray the lines of toil and the expression of grim resignation so characteristic of them. Yet in their strength and truth these paintings, beautiful as they are in color and design, have a beauty of their own that will doubtless leave a mark on modern painting.

In 1920 she returned to this country. While in New York she found subjects very different indeed from the homely scenes she had grown accustomed to, she concentrated with the same intensity as before upon a series of city themes, and in these she shows a still greater advance. Tall buildings completed in broken lines against the sky and others yet in course of construction excited her imagination, and she completed a series that excels all others in recording the topsy-turviness of New York and in suggesting the vitality within. It was from her window in the Hotel Seville that she painted these canvases, and here she also saw the Little Church Around the Corner nestling contentedly between tall sky-scrapers; in the ensemble of this picture she achieved an artistic completion beautiful in color and excellent in pattern.

The last series of her life is composed of a collection of landscapes painted at Riverdale. While these works carry the note of her Adirondack and White Mountain subjects they evidence even more structural force, and although different in mood from many of her other works they yet convey a message of profound sentiment and a sense of humility before the grandeurs of nature that in reality is always the strength of a great artist. She painted much in oil, yet her water colors, done on a broad scale, are practically without rival. Large mountain scenes in varied seasons were done in this medium apparently with the greatest ease. Her pastels are equally fine.

LOLA MERRICK

Drama

The Glass of Fashion

"HAMLET IN MODERN DRESS" (Booth Theater) is, in the first place, all that the subtitle promises. Basil Sydney, who plays Hamlet, does wear a conventional lounge suit of somber hue; Ernest Lawford, a most excellent Polonius, does hold a monocle in his critical eye; and Adrienne Morrison, a very human queen, does wear a frock more suggestive of Paris than of Elsinore. Moreover the difficulties which might seem to be involved are boldly grasped, for Hamlet is made to smoke a cigarette while he meditates upon those dreams which may trouble the sleep of death, and he kills the rat behind the arras not with a rapier but with a pistol. But though none of these things seems offensively odd—one comes indeed almost immediately to accept them—the real secret of the unexpected impressiveness of the whole performance lies less in the modern clothes which the characters wear than in the modern manners which they affect. Had the play been given by actors trained exclusively in the traditions of Shakespearean acting the result, I suspect, would have been not a little absurd, but the players in the present production suit the action to the dress. Their gestures, their intonation, and their general conduct are that of contemporaries; they speak their lines, many of them as though they were prose, with the accent and the emphasis which we, in actual conversation, would give them; and the result is to modernize "Hamlet" in the very best sense, by bringing it more closely home.

Only once during the course of the performance did anything occur to give me pause. When Hamlet stood over the kneeling figure of his uncle and said,

> He took my father grossly, full of bread,
> With all his crimes broad blown, and flush as May;
> To take him in the purging of his soul,
> When he is fit and season'd for his passage?

I was struck more strongly, perhaps, than I should have been at a more conventionally conducted performance by the outmoded thought, for I could not but say to myself: "Philosophers modern enough to hold pistols in their hands do not concern themselves with such antiquated theology." Yet the fault is actually a fault of the play, not of the production, for 'Hamlet" like all masterpieces of the really distant past has passages whose feeling is inevitably too remote to be fully comprehended. Something, too, is undoubtedly lost in the substitution of the rhythm of the thought for the rhythm of the verse in the reading of the lines; but there is also much that is gained. Some of the music, the greatest surely in all literature, is lost, but thanks to the very skilful direction the players slide gradually into poetry at those moments of heightened emotion when poetry seems most natural, and in the more level passages the positive gain in effective intelligibility is demonstrated by the behavior of the audience—which obviously appreciates points commonly missed in more conventional performances.

The real lesson of this experiment, on the whole one of the most interesting ever made, includes implications far wider in scope than any which would apply merely to the production of Shakespeare's plays, for it demonstrates clearly the fact that there is no reason why new plays, completely modern in scene, theme, and feeling, should not, in cases where their intensity would seem to justify it, be written in language which makes no pretense to imitation of current speech but takes on the elaboration and the dignity of poetry. Nobly artificial diction is not, so this production proves, incompatible with trousers or even with spats. If the time comes—and the present tendency to experiment with expressionism and other non-representative types of drama indicates that it will come—when we cease to be content with mere naturalism it will not be necessary to confine ourselves to the treatment of legendary or symbolic material; for poetic plays, differing from the present-day [illegible] in the greatness of [illegible] are undoubtedly possible.

"In a Garden" (Plymouth Theater) is an ambitiously fanciful play which deals with the story of the wife of a playwright who finally felt herself constrained to leave him because his analytical mind and his inveterate habit of playing everything as a scene crushed all the joyous spontaneity of life. It is, I think, only moderately successful because it is itself more full of ingenuity than of vitality. The heroine insists that life should be natural, the hero that it should be high comedy; but the play, unfortunately, is not quite either, for it is too artificial to be the one and a little too solemn to be the other. Nor do I think that the monotonously continuous emotional tremulo adopted by Miss Laurette Taylor in the leading role is either suitable or, in itself, particularly agreeable.

"Solid Ivory" (Central Theater) is a slangy play of baseball and neither very subtle nor very original.

Chinese Customs

By PING-TSANG CHEN

I

CHINA'S loss of her complete freedom to levy and fix her customs duties within her own territory dates from 1843. Prior to that year, the customs rate was determined by the Chinese Imperial Government and collected by its customs officials at Canton. The amount of duties levied on imports and exports varied according to the nature of the goods and was subject to alteration from year to year. Partly as a complaint against the corrupt practice and inefficiency of the Chinese customs officials and partly as a reprisal for the prohibition of the opium trade by the Chinese Government, Great Britain declared war on China in 1840. Under the pressure of force, China was driven to accept a customs rate based upon a uniform 5 per cent ad valorem, both for imports and exports, as part of the Nanking Treaty ratified at Hongkong on June 20, 1843, which thus marked the beginning of the history of China's present tariff system. In return for this concession China received nothing from Great Britain. The absence of reciprocity in the treaty arrangement shows clearly that this provision was simply a kind of war settlement.

The matter was made worse by the fact that Great Britain's insistence upon this one-sided arrangement made it inevitable to grant the same concession to other Powers. For immediately upon the heels of Great Britain, other Powers stepped in and made China include a "most-favored-nation" clause in their treaties with her. Consequently, the uniform 5 per cent tariff was applied to American and French goods in 1844 and gradually to goods from other countries, so that at present practically all states which have commercial treaties with China have obtained this privilege from her. Thus, through her defeat in the iniquitous Opium War China was compelled to surrender her tariff autonomy to Great Britain, and in order to maintain impartiality toward other nations she has been forced to increase the bond and shackle imposed upon her by the first arrangement.

Serious as is the restriction of this one-sided treaty obligation on China's sovereign right of fixing her maritime customs rates, the field of disability does not stop there; it extends further to internal customs in the form of "transit dues." By Article X of the Nanking Treaty, China was also obliged to exempt British goods from all internal dues en route when British subjects have once paid a light duty of 2½ per cent on them in addition to the import or export duty, as the case might be, at the spot where such goods were ready to move for a definite destination within Chinese territories. Thus not only was China deprived of her right to fix the tariff for foreign trade, but even her sovereign right regarding internal taxation was to a considerable extent curtailed by the British policy of coercion. In subsequent treaties between 1843 and 1875, China was made to extend the obligation to other Powers. That this arrangement is preferential in nature and unjust in effect is obvious from the fact that special privileges and immunities were given to foreign merchants but denied to Chinese. In practice, native traders have to pay dues called "likin" for their merchandise when it passes from one customs district to another in the country, whereas foreign traders may convey their merchandise to any province or city within Chinese territory and have to pay only a slight "transit due" of 2½ per cent ad valorem. In other words, by treaty the Chinese authorities are compelled to penalize native in comparison with foreign traders, since the likin payable by the former is invariably higher than the "transit due" paid by the latter.

Nor is this all. The restriction on China in the fixing of tariff rates is applied not only to maritime customs but also to the frontier customs on land. Following the example of other Powers, Russia which had had a regular commerce by land with China, extracted for the first time from her a scheduled tariff embodied in the commercial treaty of 1862. The peculiar point of the privilege granted to Russia is that the customs rate for Russian trade was reduced to two-thirds of the general tariff, i. e. to about 3 1/3 per cent ad valorem. By a later treaty it was agreed that while this was a special arrangement between China and Russia, not only Russian but all foreign merchandise shipped to China over the Chinese Eastern Railway should enjoy the same treatment. This special land frontier system, first instituted in favor of Russia, was toward the end of the nineteenth century extended to France and England in their colonial possessions in the southwestern border of China and finally to Japan after the annexation of Korea by the latter country. The French, by trade agreements with China in 1887 and 1895, and the British, by the Anglo-Chinese Convention of 1894, induced the Chinese Government to reduce land frontier duty to seven-tenths and six-tenths of the maritime customs rate for their imports and exports respectively, when they pass by land from or to Indo-China. Finally, after the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, Japan also made "a special arrangement with China whereby she secured a reduction in customs dues on goods imported into Manchuria from or through Korea and exported from Manchuria to or through Korea by rail via Antung. On dutiable goods leaving Manchuria by rail for places beyond that point, only a two-thirds customs rate is charged. The 'transit dues' on these goods are one-half of the customs charges, that is, one-half of the two-thirds normal rate. Goods from Manchuria for local consumption in Hsin Wiji or which within two years are carried by rail beyond that point pay the full rate but obtain a rebate of one-third." In a word, the land frontier customs became not only also fixed by treaty but fixed at a still lower rate than 5 per cent.

While China first lost her right of fixing customs rates through war, she lost her right of controlling the customs administration during peace. The history of the present customs administration has been admirably summarized by Senator Oscar Underwood as follows:

[illegible] eign merchants had no offices to collect customs duties.

[illegible] spectors. Under this agreement a board of foreign inspectors was appointed, and continued in office until 1858, [illegible] of trade, of which Article X provided that a high officer should be appointed by the Chinese Government to superintend the foreign trade, and that this officer might [illegible] the administration of the customs revenue, and in a number of other matters [illegible] gation. In 1914, just as the Great War was breaking, [illegible] employees.

According to the Agreement of 1906 the Inspector General of the Chinese customs is always a British subject as long as British trade exceeds that of any other state. This official directs the customs house in all treaty ports and also appoints the personnel. The Chief Commissioner of the Customs House in each treaty port is also usually a foreigner. It may be remarked, in passing, that on the whole the present system of customs administration is considered efficient and satisfactory. At the Washington Conference, the Chinese Government, speaking through its delegate, Dr. Koo, voluntarily declared that it had "no intention to effect any change which may disturb the present administration of the Chinese maritime customs."

Such a declaration, however, as Dr. Koo pointed out, "could not be reasonably construed to preclude China's legitimate aspirations gradually to make this important branch of the Chinese Government more national in character." For, though the present system of administration has been in existence for some sixty years, very few Chinese have been trained by that service. For instance, out of the forty-seven commissioners of customs, distributed among the treaty ports, there is not a single post at present occupied by a Chinese. The fact is that practically all of the important offices are monopolized by foreigners. As a result, there is a general feeling among the Chinese people that more Chinese should be trained to assume the functions of the more responsible posts in the service. However, the policy of the Chinese Government has been for decades not to interfere with the present system of administration. And at the conference now being held at Peking, the Chinese Delegation does not propose to depart from this policy.

II

The injustice of the treaty restrictions on China, however, cannot be fully appreciated unless the fact is remembered that since 1843, during a period of over three-quarters of a century, only four revisions have been made of the conventional tariff, including one which was requested by the Treaty Powers in order to promote their own commercial interests.

The first revision took place in 1858. Toward that year, prices began to drop, and the 5 per cent customs duties collected appeared consequently to be in excess of the 5 per cent prescribed. To protect their own commercial interests, the Treaty Powers asked for a revision of the tariff. This was effected in 1858 by the Treaty of Tientsin. From that time until 1902, however, as prices mounted and the Chinese Government had been receiving less than the 5 per cent rate, no request was made on the part of the Treaty Powers for a revision. If the Chinese Government did not at that time press for a revision, it must be because the needs of the Government were then comparatively few and the revenues collected, small as they were, were adequate to meet its needs.

It was not until 1902 that another revision was made. In that year, China's financial condition was rendered still more deplorable by the Boxer troubles. She was forced to pay the largest indemnity ever exacted up to that time. But at the moment she had a considerable deficit in her budget, due largely to the allocation of about a quarter of the existing revenues to the liquidation of debts already incurred, and it was hardly possible for her in her existing state of credit to pay off the indemnity of over sixty millions in a lump sum. In order to enable the Chinese Government to meet the newly imposed obligations arising out of the protocol of 1901 without involving her in immediate bankruptcy, therefore, the Powers resorted to the revision of her customs tariff. Some of the Powers, notably Russia and Germany, were willing to raise the customs duty to 10 per cent effective; but to this the British strongly objected, owing to the preponderance of their trade in China. Finally, the customs duty was raised to an effective 5 per cent, while the balance of the customs was pledged as security of the indemnity accepted.

The revision, however, could not be expected to yield satisfactory results. In the first place, it was restricted by the treaty to the alteration of the tariff only so far as to bring it up and down, as the case might be, to a 5 per cent level. Furthermore, the new schedule was based on the average prices of 1897-1899 and not on the actually prevailing prices which were higher, with the result that, as prices continued to rise rapidly, the actual duty collected soon fell to only 2½ per cent as compared with the market value of the imports. Finally, the revision applied only to imports and to the "duty free list"; no revision was made for the export tariff. As a consequence, the revenues collected according to the new tariff were far below what China was entitled to receive and were hardly sufficient to meet the obligations of the indemnity.

In 1912, as the Commercial Treaty (1902) between China and Great Britain provides for a further revision of the import tariff after ten years, and in view of the general rise in values of various kinds of merchandise, the Chinese Government made an attempt to effect a revision of the tariff. It proved to be a failure as the unanimous consent of some sixteen or seventeen Treaty Powers could not be secured. After the Chinese Republic received the formal recognition of the Powers in 1913, the Chinese Government again signified its wish to revise the tariff. But the proposal was blocked by Italy, Russia, and Japan, any single one of whom would have been sufficient to upset the general consent given by other Powers. In 1914 the European War broke out, prices soared, and the duty collected by the Chinese customs dropped tremendously. Never was the injustice of the operation of the tariff more conspicuous!

By 1917 the European War had reached a crisis, and the Allied Powers, in order to induce China to join them, consented among other things to the revision of the tariff. Later the Neutral Powers also gave their consent. So, in 1918, after many years of protracted negotiation, the third revision was effected. But then again, the revision was restricted to raising the duty to an effective 5 per cent ad valorem. Besides, it was based on the average prices of 1912-1916, so that the resulting tariff, which continued until 1923, yielded only 3½ per cent in comparison with the prices of commodities actually prevailing. When the Paris Conference was convened after the World War, China saw in it an opportunity to press for an increase of her tariff. But, as is well known, China's request before the conference was simply not considered. Her hope to receive justice from her Allies was blasted.

Despite such disillusionment and disappointment, China renewed her attempt at the Washington Conference in 1921, one of the chief purposes of which was to settle problems relating to China. Again her attempt met with failure. China was allowed only to have her tariff duty brought up to an effective 5 per cent ad valorem; her demand for tariff autonomy was ignored on the ground of her lack of a strong and stable government. In accordance with the Washington Treaty, a commission met in Shanghai in March, 1922; the customs duties were revised on the basis of the Shanghai market values for the preceding six months; and the new tariff went into effect in January, 1923. This was the fourth and the last revision.

III

The arrangements entered into at the Washington Conference are of sufficient importance to deserve more than passing interest.

The Powers having promised, by Article II of the "Root Principles," "to provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government," it was with some degree of confidence that the Chinese Delegation brought forward its first practical suggestion for carrying out this resolution: restoration to China of her tariff autonomy. In its statement to the conference, the Chinese Delegation made it clear that the Chinese Government did not propose to interfere with the existing administration of maritime customs in China nor with the devotion of the funds to the liquidation of foreign loans secured thereon. Two things, however, it did ask for: (1) That "the right to fix and differentiate the tariff rates" be restored to China after the lapse of a certain period of time, in return for which it promised to abolish the likin; and (2) that, pending the negotiation for fixing a maximum rate and as an immediate measure of relief, the Chinese import tariff be raised to 12½ per cent effective, a rate mentioned in the Chinese treaties of 1902 and 1903 with Great Britain, the United States, and Japan.

This request was referred to a Sub-committee on Chinese Fiscal Affairs, headed by Senator Oscar Underwood. In the debates of this committee, it was reported that the United States was willing to grant China the 12½ per cent increase in duties at once, that Great Britain would grant 7½ per cent, but that Japan was willing to bring the Chinese tariff up to only 5 per cent effective. Whoever the objecting Powers were, they succeeded in defeating the most important request which China made at the conference. Instead, a compromise plan was reported on January 5, 1922, and later embodied in the Customs Treaty of February 6, 1922. Article I of this treaty provided for the revision of the Chinese tariff in 1922, which has been referred to above. Articles II, III, and VI formed the legal basis of the present Customs Conference at Peking and contained in substance the following provisions:

> Art. II. Within three months after the coming into force of the treaty, a special conference shall meet in China to "take immediate steps . . . to prepare the way" for the abolition of the likin tax and for the fulfilment of other conditions laid down in the treaties of 1902 and 1903 between China and Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, with a view to raising the tariff to 12½ per cent effective in accordance with those treaties.
> Art. III. The special conference shall authorize the levying of a surtax prior to the abolition of the likin "as from such date for such purposes, and subject to such conditions as it may determine." "The surtax shall be at a uniform rate of 2½ per cent ad valorem, provided that in case of certain articles of luxury which, in the opinion of the special conference, can bear a greater increase without unduly impeding trade, the total surtax may be increased but not exceed 5 per cent ad valorem."
> Art. VI. "The principle of uniformity in the rates of customs duties levied at all the land and maritime frontiers of China is hereby recognized. The special conference . . . shall make arrangements to give practical effect to this principle. . . ."

This Nine-Power Customs Treaty, negotiated four years ago, was not ratified by France until last August, owing to the gold-franc controversy with China, which thus showed one of the many ways by which, because of the vague wording of the treaty, even the permanent increases of the Chinese tariff which it promised might be prevented.

IV

We shall now turn from the historical side of the Chinese tariff question and consider briefly the grounds for China's demand for the recovery of her tariff autonomy.* A little reflection on the existing treaty provisions, by which the levy of customs duties, "transit dues," and other imposts is regulated, will show their injustice and evil consequences to China.

In the first place, the treaty provisions constitute not only a restriction on China's freedom of action but an infringement of her sovereignty. The right to regulate the tariff is a most important right, to guard the integrity of which no nation can be too jealous; not only because it constitutes a part of the power of taxation but also because the tariff rate has the power to alter the direction of the economic development of a country.

Again, the present tariff regime deprives China of her power to make reciprocity arrangements with the Treaty Powers. Though every Power enjoys the privilege of having its wares imported into China at the exceptionally low rate of 5 per cent ad valorem, Chinese produce and merchandise, on entering into any of these countries, are subject to the maximum rates leviable, which are in some cases 60 or 70 times the rate which she herself levies on foreign imports. Thus, it was estimated in 1921, Chinese tea imported into the United Kingdom had to pay a 5 per cent duty; Chinese tobacco imported into Japan, 350 per cent; raw silk into Japan, 30 per cent; and manufactured silk into the United States, 35 to 60 per cent.

Nor needs it to be pointed out that such a tariff regime is a serious impediment to China's export trade and economic development. First of all, while most foreign nations are building up tariff walls to protect their industries, China is absolutely unable, through her lack of power of tariff legislation, to adopt any protective tariff to encourage her industries, which are still in an infant stage. Furthermore, the necessity of levying uniform duties on all articles imported into China makes these duties on such articles as machinery and raw materials for Chinese industries a further handicap to China's industrial development.

Another natural consequence of the present tariff arrangement is the great injustice and inequality done to the payers of taxes. Comparing themselves with foreign traders, Chinese merchants feel hurt because they pay much higher dues and duties for the same kind of goods than do the former. And the consumers of native products are liable to higher taxation than consumers of foreign goods, because native goods are subject to the likin and other internal taxes while goods of foreign origin are only slightly taxed.

Again, too much emphasis cannot be laid on the fact that the present tariff regime has caused and is causing a serious loss of revenue to the Chinese Government. Customs duties form one of the most important sources of revenue of a country. But in the case of China, the customs import duty is limited to the very low rate of 5 per cent ad valorem for all classes for dutiable goods, as compared with the average rate of 15 to 60 per cent levied by other countries. But even this rate is only nominal, for the periodical revision provided for by the treaties has never been carried out in due time, and when it has been effected, the basis of valuation adopted is always lower than the actual value at the time. Consequently, as it was estimated in 1921, customs duties constituted only about 7½ per cent of China's total revenue, whereas they gave Great Britain 12 per cent; France, 15 per cent; and the United States, 35 per cent. Moreover, a large part of China's customs revenue is pledged to meet various foreign loans secured thereon and this fact again reduces the amount available for the needs of the Government. At the Washington Conference, China asked for increases amounting to $300,000,000, but what she obtained fell far below that figure. For even if it be assumed that the present conference at Peking could put into effect the levy of the promised surtax of 2½ per cent for ordinary articles and of 5 per cent on certain luxuries, in addition to the 5 per cent effective ad valorem on all dutiable goods, the increase in revenue will be only about $46,000,000. Such an increase will hardly be commensurate with the rapidly growing needs of the Chinese Government, such as those for education, sanitation, road building, and public welfare.

Finally, it may be noted that regulation of China's tariff by treaty must inevitably, in the nature of things, work unjustly to her great detriment. Thus, whenever China makes a proposal, be it for a revision of the tariff to bring it more into harmony with the prevailing prices or for an increase of the customs duty to meet her increased needs, the unanimous consent of more than a dozen Treaty Powers is necessary. As each country naturally desires to protect and promote its own commercial interests in China, all the Treaty Powers seek to avoid the burden of the new revision or increased rate falling upon the industries of their own countries. Under such circumstances the difficulty of effecting any adjustment or arrangements favorable to China can be easily conceived.

SHALL THE UNITED STATES enter the World Court? As our readers are aware we have leaned in that direction, perhaps because we did not feel that it made much difference one way or another. But we are clear that we should not enter the court without at least the four reservations proposed two years ago by Mr. Hughes—to prevent amendment of the World Court charter without our consent, to give us a voice in the selection of judges, to provide for the payment by the United States of a fair share of the court's expenses, and, most important, to give assurance that accepting the court would not be entrance into the League of Nations. These are admirable reservations, but they do not go far enough. Entering the World Court is a momentous step. The history of our country shows that authority was not given the United States Supreme Court to exert force in executing its decrees against our States nor has it ever tried to do so; that the intangible yet potent power of public opinion has been the only authority behind the court. If we enter the World Court we should see to it that the conditions of entry are such that the court shall be backed by no power except that of world opinion. More than that, the United States should condition its entry on effective agreements that neither the court nor the League, nor any of its members, shall have power to enforce the decrees of the tribunal by war or by economic pressure of any kind. Only under such circumstances will the World Court truly be a court of justice and not a court of arms.

SECRETARY MELLON is a fortunate man in more ways than one. There can be no question that if our Republican rulers and the press and the public had the sensitiveness in regard to the business relations of officials which prevailed in this country during the Roosevelt campaigns for the divorce of politics from business Secretary Mellon would have to get out of the Cabinet. The two Democratic members of the Federal Trade Commission last week published their dissent from the majority rule of their commission which withholds from the Department of Justice all information pertaining to Mr. Mellon's Aluminum Company of America that the commission obtained from that company. Messrs. Nugent and Thompson deliberately accuse their fellow-commissioners of making the commission "an accessory after the fact in aiding a possible criminal to evade trial and escape punishment." It is impossible to brush aside this statement on the ground of partisan bias, for the reason that former Attorney General Stone wrote to the commission that the aluminum trust had deliberately violated the decree of the federal court and added: "The fair inference is the company either was indifferent to the provisions of the decree or knowingly intended that its provisions should be disregarded with a view to suppressing competition in the aluminum industry." Finally, the two protestants point out that the evidence in the case of a rival of Mr. Mellon's company, the Aluminum Goods Manufacturing Company, was turned over to the Department of Justice, while Mr. Mellon's company was protected. This would be a first-class political scandal if Washington and the public were not surfeited with them and indifferent to them. Had Mr. Mellon not the hide of a rhinoceros he would resign promptly, and Mr. Coolidge would ask him to were he sensitive of the honor of his Cabinet.

"COOLIDGE AROUSED by Lewis Letter; Plans Firm Reply"—thus a newspaper headline. Stuff! Can a mouse bite or a rabbit turn carnivorous? Yet the newspapers which have created the fictitious Coolidge continue to "play him up" as a man of force and resolution capable of facing an issue, grappling largely and boldly with it, and then dominating it. When and where? For this is the same President and the same Coolidge who, on July 19, last, assured the newspaper correspondents at Swampscott—of course through that alter ego "the spokesman for the President"—that he was "determined to prevent a coal strike," and a few days later let it be known that he had a plan of a "revolutionary nature" to propose if, after all, a strike came to pass. Well, the strike came and the little, calm, cool man had nothing to suggest; no plan of any kind, revolutionary or otherwise, was forthcoming. So now we have more thundering because John L. Lewis, head of the United Mine Workers, has sent a letter which the President, or whoever told him to, "interprets as a threat and an unfair statement in the case—a veiled attempt to place responsibility upon the Government for labor conditions." Well, all we can say is we don't propose to enter our private cyclone cellar just yet, nor would we advise Mr. Lewis, the impudent, to take to his—not even if the President has included in his message a proposal to forbid strikes in essential industries. For just when Mr. Coolidge's sense of outrage begins to master him he will, we are sure, recall the constitutional inhibitions upon his office, and recongeal.

WALL STREET OWNS BELGIUM and now supersedes the Belgian Parliament. This is the statement of Mr. Jaspar, a former Minister, who publicly asked Vandervelde, the Foreign Minister, whether the government was acting under pressure of American and British bankers in cutting its budget by 150,000,000 francs, and whether "the Belgian Parliament is no longer in control of the situation." Vandervelde replied: "The statements in the press to that effect are exactly true. The government had its choice between two alternatives, either to obtain a loan or give up stabilization of the Belgian franc. The ministers were unanimous in the opinion that . . . the best thing to do was to submit to the requirements of the foreign capitalists and obtain stabilization of the Belgian currency." The leading Belgian papers, such as the Nation Belge, Indépendance Belge, and Etoile Belge, three conservative organs, confess to the state of "vassalage and servitude" in which the country has been placed, while the more liberal and radical newspapers denounce the government for its surrender. So Belgium has found out the truth, but Belgium is not the only slave and vassal to the American money power. Germany is another, and if French finances continue in their present sorry plight, or get worse, we venture to predict a Dawes Plan for France and Wall Street vassalage for her. Perhaps there is no other way out, as Vandervelde has said, but the fact that the whole world is coming to be the financial vassal of America does not mitigate the gravity of the situation or prevent it from working infinite harm to the vassals and, what is more important for us, to their masters.

CABINETS COME AND GO in France with whirligig speed, and meanwhile the country's financial troubles remain without even an approach toward a settlement. Our daily press hails the advent of Aristide Briand—with Louis Loucheur as Minister of Finance—with optimism, and the announcement of the new cabinet caused a slight advance in the exchange value of the franc. We cannot see any reason for rejoicing. Both Briand and Loucheur, it is argued, are strong for a debt settlement with the United States and have the ability to obtain one. What of it? How will an undertaking on the part of France to pay the United States an annual tribute, however small, make it easier for her to settle her internal obligations? Because, we hear somebody say, when France has signed a debt compact she will get a loan in the United States just as Italy did. Again what of it? This will be pulling herself up by the boot-straps. It will be one more pile on the already mountainous debt. There are only two ways of meeting that debt—taxation or repudiation. The internal debt has already been practically repudiated to the tune of 80 per cent by the inflation of the currency and the consequent depreciation in the value of the franc. If any of the franc's value is to be saved, it can be done only through drastic taxation of wealth and privilege. Louis Loucheur, with his close identification with French big business, is exceedingly unlikely to propose any such course.

THAT THE GERMAN REICHSTAG has approved the Locarno treaties and that they have been signed by the Government ought to surprise nobody. We were unable from the first to share the concern of those commentators who thought that the Luther Government might be overthrown and the treaties fail because of the opposition of the nationalistic and imperialistic elements. As long as President Hindenburg stood fast there could be no question as to the outcome, but even had he not, the opposition would not have triumphed. There is too much at stake; Locarno meant too great a step forward for the treaties to be rejected while sanity ruled in Germany. We do not deny that there are uncomfortable things in those pacts and that it is more the spirit behind them than the text which will count in helping to keep the peace in Europe. We particularly regret that it was not possible for the Germans to obtain a reconsideration of the war-guilt issue and that much in the treaties strengthens the Treaty of Versailles while other portions override it. But as we have said, the overwhelming balance is on one side. While so much credit is being given to Briand and Austen Chamberlain let it not be forgotten that the Germans originated this whole proposal of a security pact for the Rhine.

SEDITIOUS CONSPIRACY and attempt to incite to mutiny and to seduce soldiers and sailors from their duty is the grave-sounding charge for which the twelve Communists on trial in London have been sentenced, some to six months and others to a year in prison. The first offenders, who were given six months, had even an opportunity to go free if they would pledge themselves to renounce the Communist Party and all its works. There is certainly an inconsistency here. If the charge is as bad as it sounds, if the safety of the empire is seriously threatened by these persons, then the punishment should evidently have been more severe. Deprivation of liberty for half a year indicates that the Crown does not really think the empire in danger; in that case, why say that it is? Why not merely charge the Communists with being a nuisance, with interruption of the sleep of worthy Tories, with loud talking on street corners, with any of a dozen minor offenses? For these a light sentence would be suitable and the triviality of the whole matter would be clear. In America we do these things more expertly; a man is sentenced to from five to fifteen years in the penitentiary. And while these sentences—and the British ones—are being served the republic and the empire go on about as usual, and in each case the Communist Party flourishes because of the persecution of its members.

IN RUSSIA, which some think a benighted and barbarous country, two gipsies caught at horse-stealing were burned alive by an infuriated mob. Walter Duranty, correspondent of the New York Times, grows eloquent on the subject: "From the background of medieval cruelty and superstition that still hangs, darkling, over the Russian people, there sometimes blazes forth a survival so monstrous as to be hardly credible." Is it not impolite of Mr. Duranty to be able barely to credit in Russia what is common news in the United States? Here, when men are burned to death, as they are every year in our glorious republic, when they are mutilated, hung to convenient trees, and their bodies punctured with bullets, when they are dragged through the streets with ropes around their necks and then shot, the news item is small and rarely makes the front page. Nor is this all. Mr. Duranty ends his account thus: ". . . only by degrees [the] facts became known to the authorities. Now, after five months and twenty-six days, the ringleaders have been arrested, including members of the village soviet . . . who will be tried immediately by the Moscow tribunal." But at the most recent burning in the State of Mississippi the crowd was not so diffident; some of them were not afraid to be photographed standing near the victim; one of them was not afraid to say in the Jackson Daily News: "Investigation? Shucks, there won't be any. . . . No officer down there is going to dare try to identify anyone because nobody's mad about it." Alas, for barbarous, medieval Russia. We are in America; we burn men alive every year and they don't have to be caught doing anything; we just suspect them. But our victims are Negroes; and that, of course, is different.

WHITE SPACES both in the news and editorial columns of the Campus, the student publication of the College of the City of New York, effectively advertise the ban President Mezes has placed on further discussion of compulsory military training in that institution. The students voted 6 to 1 for the abolition of compulsion; they were duly denounced by certain self-constituted guardians of patriotism as traitors, from which charge Mr. Mezes defended them by a "they're all right but, boylike, they want to dodge some irksome drill" statement which, it has been pointed out, is neither complimentary nor true. Then the president clapped on the muzzle hard, adding denial of free speech and discussion to compulsory drill in an American college. For all this it would be easy to denounce Mr. Mezes and point again the finger of scorn at his brand of weak-kneed ineffectual liberalism. But to do this and merely this is to miss the true problem. We doubt if President Mezes likes his present role. We strongly suspect that he fears that any other would imperil the city appropriations which he feels the growth of the college demands. His fear may be a bit cowardly but it is not groundless. In other words, not one man but a false sense of patriotism in our governing bodies, and in the more articulate public opinion, is to blame. This ignorant, unreflective patriotism of preparedness is the enemy. Against it the City College boys are planning to keep up the fight. They deserve the active support of all citizens who love peace, liberty, and the best American traditions of education.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S FIGURES in his recent speech before the Chamber of Commerce in New York City are as dubious as the economic principles he laid down. However much we may differ on economic principles, we are always ready to pay respectful attention to figures. But as the New York World has pointed out, these particular figures are questionable in the extreme. The President says that wages are 20 per cent above those of 1920 and 120 per cent above pre-war levels, while prices have fallen 30 per cent since 1920 and are only 57 per cent above pre-war averages. The result, obviously, is a paradise for the wage-earner of today. Paradise indeed, if only it were true! With 120 per cent more cash and only a 57 per cent increase in the goods that cash will buy, the improvement in the standard of living of the wayfaring man would be profound. The first trouble is that the President bases his statement on wholesale prices. The worker does not buy wholesale. The cost of living measured in prices the worker has to pay declined only 20 per cent from June, 1920, to June, 1925, according to the federal government's own Bureau of Labor Statistics. Secondly, the assumed 20 per cent increase in wages since 1920 is not borne out by statistical evidence. Average per capita wages for factory workers in New York State are now below the 1920 average and so are pay-roll figures as reported by the United States Department of Labor. The department reports average hourly wages for common labor at 38 cents, compared with 49 cents in 1920. Farm labor is receiving $49 a month, against $65 in 1920. So Mr. Coolidge's statistical utopia turns out to be, as Broadway would put it, a "flop."

A NEW OCEAN QUEEN has arrived in New York and her crossing may prove as epoch-making as that of the first transatlantic steamship. The new queen bears the historic name of Gripsholm and she belongs to the Swedish-American Line. She is the first Diesel-engine liner to enter the New York passenger service. No soot, no smoke—engines that work, similarly to those of automobiles, by direct explosive power—this is what the new boat has to offer besides a sea speed of 17¾ knots, something, it was stoutly averred, the Diesel-engine could never achieve because of the size and weight such a speed would call for and the cost. There is a greater original cost in the new as opposed to older types of engines, no less than $125,000 in an 8,000-ton steamship, which means more than $15 extra per ton. But the economy of operation is so great that European owners are not hesitating, and it is probably only a question of a short time before a majority of the cargo fleets of the world will be Diesel-engined. Lord Inverforth, president of the British Institute of Marine Engineers and himself the owner of Diesel-engine cargo vessels, is enthusiastically in favor of them. Comparing a steamship and a motor vessel of about the same size which recently voyaged in ballast from Japan to Australia and thence to Europe with a cargo of wheat, he finds that the Diesel ship earned $7,500 more profit than the steamship. Of special interest to intending voyagers on the Gripsholm is Lord Inverforth's assertion that in all weathers the new type is steadier, propeller revolutions being maintained regularly with an almost complete absence of the racing of the screws which, in rough weather, is so trying to passengers in vessels equipped with older types of engines. The internal-combustion engine is thus winning on sea as on land.

Government by Guess

A NEW ENGLAND skipper who sighted one day a sandy coast observed to the mate that it must be Cape Cod. "What makes you think so?" asked the mate.

"Because," replied the skipper, "I sail by guess and by God and I guess, by God, that that's Cape Cod."

The government of the United States, like a good deal of navigation, is largely a matter of guess; how much it is also a matter of God is for each individual to decide according to his opinion of the government—and of the Deity. Herbert Hoover, our Secretary of Commerce, seems to think that guess predominates. When Hamilton laid out the scheme of executive departments he placed the different functions of administration as nearly as might be into groups of the same general major purpose under single-headed responsibility.

> But ever since his time [says Mr. Hoover] we have been busy dividing responsibility by scattering services directed to substantially the same major purpose over many different executive departments and bureaus. Our governmental machinery has just grown. Whenever a new activity has been authorized or a new bureau created it has been thrown wherever it happened to be most convenient at the moment, or wherever its sponsors thought it would have the most friendly treatment, without any thought of a sound basis of organization, and we have shunted along misfit after misfit from one generation to another.
> On the executive side of the federal government we have grown to have more than 200 different bureaus, boards, and commissions, employing several hundred thousand people. For the most part they have been thrown hodge-podge into ten different executive departments, under cabinet officers. But there are more than forty independent establishments either directly under the President or directly under Congress.

The chief misfortune in all this, Mr. Hoover thinks, is the confusion of executive, legislative, and judicial functions. "Every single department, bureau, and board in the entire government," he says, "should be placed upon the operating table and a clean-cut separation established between semi-judicial and semi-legislative functions on the one hand and administration on the other." He goes on to explain:

> With the growing complexity of problems it has been necessary for Congress to delegate to the executive side many secondary legislative functions in the making of regulations, and many secondary judicial functions in the enforcement of them. That is the so-called administrative law. And there has been the crudest mixing of these semi-legislative and semi-judicial and advisory functions with purely executive functions. Moreover, these semi-judicial and semi-legislative duties are frequently intrusted to single officers, while purely administrative functions are often carried on by boards. All of this is exactly the reverse of the basic principles of sound administration. Boards and commissions are soundly adapted to the deliberative processes necessary to semi-judicial and semi-legislative and advisory function., but they are absolutely hopeless where decisive administrative action is necessary.

As an example of boards in which there is an unsatisfactory mixture of functions Mr. Hoover cites the Shipping Board—surely a glaring failure—the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and the Federal Power Commission. But a board as administrator is no more out of place, he thinks, than a single executive who is saddled with legislative and judicial functions. "No individual should be at the same time legislator, policeman, prosecutor, judge, and jury. . . . The dangers of oppression in these matters are not merely a theory—they are a fact." The acts of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and of the Immigration Bureau frequently present striking instances of oppression through the combination of semi-judicial with executive powers—less the fault of the administrators than of the system.

Another weakness is the way in which services directed toward the same or similar purposes are scattered. Mr. Hoover makes the following partial classification to illustrate the point (the first vertical row of figures indicating the number of bureaus or agencies, the second the number of departments or independent agencies in which they are located):

Public works construction.....	14	9
Conservation of national resources.	8	5
Direct aids to industry.....	5	2
Direct aids to merchant marine...	14	6
Direct aids to education.....	6	3
Direct aids to veterans.....	4	4
Government of territories and dependencies	4	3
Public health	4	2
Purchase of $250,000,000 of supplies annually	In every bureau of the government

The divided responsibility which results from this condition is fatal to the development of continuous and definite policies. Mr. Hoover cites the recent occurrences in regard to oil leases as an example of what happens when single-headed responsibility is lacking. "No policy of real guardianship of our reserve resources will exist until we put all conservation business in the hands of an Under Secretary for Conservation, with the spotlight of public opinion continuously focused upon him," he says.

Mr. Hoover summarizes his suggestions in regard to better federal administration thus:

> We have succeeded in two major steps; we still have a third equally important and perhaps more difficult one to accomplish. The first was the establishment of government employment based upon merit. The second was the establishment of adequate control of appropriations through the budget system. There still remains the third and even greater but more obscure waste—that of faulty organization of administrative functions. And the two first steps will never reach the full realization without the third. . . .
> What we need is three primary reforms: first, to group together all agencies having the same predominant major purpose under the same administrative supervision; second, to separate the semi-judicial and the semi-legislative and advisory functions from the administrative functions, placing the former under joint minds, the latter under single responsibility; and third, we should relieve the President of a vast amount of direct administrative labor.

Mr. Hoover has called attention to an unspectacular but vital need to which Congress may well address itself.

Settling the Coal Strike

CONSUMERS of anthracite who have kept cool with Coolidge—and are getting cooler as the coal bin shrinks—will do well to study a proposal just put forth for the immediate settlement of the strike and for making such crises less inevitable in the future. As we go to press it is announced that the mine owners have refused the truce for resumption of work which was proposed by Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania and had been accepted by the miners. In any event such truces get us nowhere in the settlement of fundamental difficulties. If progress is to be made in that direction, all parties to the question will do well to consider the proposal of which we speak. The Committee on Coal and Giant Power, with headquarters at 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City, has drafted the plan and has sent it to officials of the miners and of the operators. The committee is made up of liberal engineers, economists, accountants, publicists, lawyers, and business men, from all parts of the country. What they propose may be stated as follows:

1. A wage increase of 50 cents a day for all day workers. The 84,000 men in this group are the most poorly paid in the industry. They now receive from $4.62 to $5.96 a shift; thus the increase is in the neighborhood of 10 per cent.

2. For mining companies whose profits were better than 10 per cent on their investment for the 12-month period preceding the strike, no increase in prices shall be allowed. They can absorb the wage increase without hardship.

3. For mining companies whose pre-strike profits were less than 10 per cent on their investment, an increase of 25 cents per ton on domestic sizes of anthracite shall be allowed. It is estimated by the committee that this 25 cents will cover the $11,340,000 per year which the 50 cents a day wage increase calls for.

4. A revision of piece rates for those skilled miners who do not work on a day basis, so that no miner in this group will be able to earn more than $3,000 per year. This adjustment is to be introduced gradually over a three-year period, and will be based on 270 working days in the year—which is the normal operating period in the anthracite mines.

5. A raising of all piece rates which are below the average, up to the average of each craft. A main source of current trouble is the variation of piece rates in the same craft. This adjustment is likewise to be spread over a three-year period. It is to be worked out by fields and on the basis of a 270-day year.

6. The check-off (or collection of union dues by the operator at the time of pay-roll disbursements) shall be instituted only at those mines where a referendum shows two-thirds of all workers in favor of it. This provision would tend to establish whether the miners want the check-off or not.

7. The immediate appointment of a committee of seven; two members to be miners, two members to be operators, and the four to add three members representing the general public. This committee shall proceed forthwith to a determination of those companies which shall be allowed the 25 cents per ton increase; shall work out the technical detail of the proposed adjustments in piece rates; and shall supervise the balloting in the proposed referendums on the check-off. Such a committee would meet the drastic need of the industry for an executive body which should take into consideration the point of view of the consuming public as well as the viewpoints of the miners and operators.

8. The committee of seven shall submit to the public, six months before the expiration of the current proposed agreement, a complete report on the condition and the requirements of the industry. The committee shall not be an arbitrating body but a fact-finding body. It shall study all necessary problems of cost, profit, investment, depletion, royalties, labor efficiency, regulation of employment, waste elimination. It shall study with great care plans proposed by either miners or operators for the improvement or reorganization of the industry, in whole or in part. It shall have complete access to the books of the operators and of the miners' union. The expenses of the committee shall be underwritten jointly by the operators and the miners to the extent of $50,000 each. This last provision thus looks to the future peace of the industry. It lays the basis for negotiations founded upon accredited facts. A full half year before the termination of the current agreement the committee lays all the relevant facts before the country. In the light of such publicity another such farce as that staged last summer at Atlantic City would become impossible. The plan would end the procedure of fighting in a fog of irresponsible statements and harsh names.

Here is a concrete and to us an intelligent proposal. It is for the miners and the operators to show cause why it should not have the most diligent and serious consideration, to the end that an outrageous and intolerable situation may be liquidated—and kept liquidated.

Timotheus

THOSE who have always felt that only man's weakness has saved him from self-destruction find something ominous about the gradual perfection of his institutions and machines. That only the relative imperfection of the implements of war has prevented the nations from exterminating one another is a commonplace, but spiritual death has been often just as close as physical. Suppose, for example, that the Middle Ages had known enough of psychology to make its censorship and propaganda absolutely effective and thus frozen mankind immovably in the perfect orthodoxy which it desired. Or suppose that it had had the power which certain biologists confidently predict we shall ultimately have, the power of determining in advance the characters of the children born to us. Would it not, by choosing a race composed of perfect monks, have allowed mankind to die of frigid piety? And shall not we, if the powers denied a less scientific age are ever given us, use them as badly as the Middle Ages would have done? Is it not, in a word, true that man has been saved in spite of himself and because he could not control his own destiny?

In his "Icarus" Bertrand Russell solemnly suggested, without definitely proposing, this question; and now in "Timotheus; or the Future of the Theatre," a little volume published by Dutton in the same To-Day and To-Morrow Series, Bonamy Dobrée jokingly describes the place of the stage in the perfectly regularized society. Having possessed himself of the Wells Time Machine, he is projected into the year 2100 and makes a tour of the theaters. Here, so he discovers, the crude method of the acted story has been displaced by devices constructed upon sound psychological principles for producing any desired emotional reaction in the audience. Shadowy figures flit across the ceiling of the strange, parabolic auditorium; curiously disturbing perfumes assault his nostrils; sounds not quite articulate buzz in his ears. Intellectually he comprehends nothing, but he is filled with a feeling of generosity, and when he sees the people hurrying away from the theater to subscribe to a national loan at the banks he understands the purpose of the performance. The state, being in need of money, has simply commanded a purse-loosening performance of a scientifically perfect effectiveness, and it can upon this as upon all other occasions produce in its citizens the mood necessary at the moment. When war is to be declared bellicose emotions can be easily aroused, and when peace is to be made an erstwhile militant audience can be transformed in the space of a few hours into a group of the most lamblike pacifists. Literature has been discarded as depending too much upon the temperament and thought associations of the individual for its effect, but rhythms and gases acting directly upon the nerves cannot fail, and thus the theater has become the perfect instrument of propaganda for which the world is obviously now seeking. Thanks to it there can be no argument and no dissent.

At the prospect thus presented—and it is not utterly fantastic—we can do nothing but shudder, for we do not like the idea of having any descendant of King Coolidge regulate the emotions of even our great-great-great-grandchildren. But if the arts are captured we see no hope, for art has, indeed, always been the one sure escape which even the orthodox have had from their orthodoxy. Under the very patronage of the church itself painting and sculpture reaffirmed the beauty of the physical world and the joy of living which the church was denying, and in literature is always found the instinctive protest of nature against the iron-clad inadequacies of theology, sociology, and ethics; for it is the proper voice of whatever needs or desires are unrecognized by current consciousness. Just as the fabliaux and the romances of the Middle Ages dressed the balance against the scholastic philosophy which made no allowance for man's humanity, so now art and letters defend the rights of this same humanity against the modern schoolmen who would reduce us to a mere social unit and measure all values in terms of science or sociology. Thus far they have always been the expression of the things which the state could not control and the thinker could not influence. A love story still saves us from taking the more fanatical apostles of eugenics too seriously and a drinking song remains a most popular argument against the prohibitionist who comes armed with a table of vital statistics. Just as art once saved us from the puritanism of theology, it saves us now from the puritanism of science. But should it ever become a science itself—the servant of the bungling intellect uncorrected by that instinct which will continue just as it did in the Middle Ages to know things which it cannot prove—we shall be completely at the mercy of that logic from which we escaped because it was not powerful enough to make us all monks, all utilitarians, or all positivists.

God help the people whose rulers are able to make both its laws and its songs.

"I Thank You"

WHO it was that originated the custom now universally adopted by American orators of high and low degree of concluding their remarks with a fervent "I thank you," we do not know. Careful research in the debates of the Constitutional Convention fails to reveal any such utterance by Madison, Monroe, Hamilton, or any others—which throws doubt upon the antecedents as well as the good Americanism of this practice. Traces of the custom appear in the early Know-Nothing campaigns. We have been unable, however, to verify the allegation that it was first used in the late fifties by "Jim" Wallace, a Missouri Dick Turpin, who in a somewhat lengthy speech at the gallows confessed his guilt, secure in his new-found faith in Jehovah, and thanked his audience just prior to his departure for eternity. We are, therefore, inclined to believe that the almost universal appearance of what is now the inevitable ending of every address is akin to those curious phenomena by which a hundred millions of people become infected overnight by a phrase such as "I'll tell the world" or "I hope to tell you."

We confess that to us the speaker's terminal gratitude still appears something of an inversion. Should the speaker thank the audience or the audience the speaker? Here is a subject for high-school and intercollegiate debates far more enlightening than those tedious battles of words as to whether America should enter the League of Nations or the World Court, or the debate now so popular in girls' schools: "Is the Unspeakable Turk Unspeakable?" We confess to almost never hearing a speaker thank his audience without feeling like rising and saying: "Thank you!" or "The thanks are on us," or "Thank Heaven you did not talk five minutes longer." Some speakers assure us that their conclusion is neither a custom nor a form, but a devout expression of their joy in finding one more audience committed to the doctrine of "Live and let live." Some opine, also, that after talking for an hour to a group of Rotarians or a chamber of commerce the concluding ejaculation is both an expression of relief at the ending of the impossible task of drilling an idea into the multitude before them and gratitude that their honorarium is safely earned.

In any event, they assert that the phrase is neither meaningless nor a mere formula. They insist that it pulsates with emotion even if their speeches do not. They point out, moreover, that it is capable of differing emphasis: "I thank you," as one conscious of his superiority to the Kiwanians before him; "I thank you," conveying the conventional relief that the joint ordeal is over; or "I thank you," with subtle but infinite scorn for the dunderheads who missed the point of the speaker's neatest jokes and most delicate sarcasms. Here we have a constructive suggestion to make (since every well-regulated editorial must end with one). We urge that the one-sidedness of the present arrangement cease and that, hereafter, at the conclusion of an address the audience shall rise and chant with the speaker: "I thank you." This arrangement would have the further merit that everybody could then leave at once, and no kindly, pitying person need remain a minute to take the abandoned speaker's hand and say fervently: "I did so enjoy your brilliant address. What did you say the subject was?"

The Aircraft Disgrace

By H. L. SCAIFE

[Copyright, 1925, by the Author]

FOR eight years the American air services have been reeking with scandal. Twenty official investigations have failed to remove the sheet and ascertain the trouble, until finally only a corpse remains. Timely warnings have been unheeded. Truth has been suppressed, and out of a mass of conflicting testimony it is necessary to segregate the important facts and cite the official records that will fix the responsibility and indicate the wreckage that must be cleared away before a foundation can be laid for a constructive program.

The officer in charge of the information division of the Army Air Service at the Mitchell court martial testified that there were 517 fatalities in the Government's air services from January 1, 1919, to June 30, 1925, and that 25 per cent of the crashes were due to structural failure.

The testimony of the officer in charge of the tactical division of the Army Air Service is that we now have only 69 planes that are modern, up to date, and designed for the purposes for which they were intended.

At the close of the war Major General Mason M. Patrick, chief of the Army Air Service, testified that when hostilities ceased our rank in aviation was far behind any of our Allies and far below the enemy's strength, and that so far as the manufacture of pursuit and bombing planes in the United States was concerned we were practically in the same position as when we entered the war, and that it would probably be eight or nine months from the time they settled on a type before they would produce it in quantities.[1] The unsatisfactory situation which exists today may be gathered from the mass of details and conflicting opinions which have been made the basis of charges by Colonel William Mitchell.

The figures representing costs have been juggled, and it is not possible to ascertain with any degree of accuracy the amount of money spent or actually wasted. In an official statement issued by officials of the Army Air Service a discrepancy of $250,610,693.17 was discovered, which false information was given to the public with deliberate design.[2] An amount in excess of $700,000,000 was spent without producing a single American-made fighting plane at the battle-front, and during the war aviation fatalities in the United States, where American-made planes were flown, reached a higher figure than those of the American aviation forces in France where our aviators flew over the battle-front in foreign-made planes, some of which previously had been discarded by our Allies.[3]

Since the war another half billion dollars has gone to join the $700,000,000 already spent. Plans are on foot for still a further raid on the Treasury, this time for subsidies in the name of commercial aviation which, if allowed before the situation is cleared up, will probably mean a handout of another half billion.

The enormous amounts we have invested in aviation are almost beyond human comprehension. Since the war we have invested in aviation $125,000,000 more than the entire cost of the construction of the Panama Canal, including the $40,000,000 paid for the French rights and the $10,000,000 paid to Panama.

Under present conditions, according to statistics of what we have spent and what we have got, if an effective program should suddenly call for 2,000 fighting planes "designed for the purposes for which they are intended," delivery would be made in 232 years, the planes would cost more than $17,000,000 each and 18,453 lives. A rough comparison of gross expenditures and gross results shows on its face the earmarks of a colossal swindle. While such a comparison is true for practical purposes, it would not be fair without considering the large number of planes that have seen use and have become obsolete and enormous expenditures that were legitimate. Crediting the air services, however, with all the good that has been accomplished and with liberal allowance for all legitimate expenditures not chargeable to production, the difference between what we spent and what we got in part appears in the official audits of aircraft contracts in the Department of Justice, where the cases have been ready for criminal and civil prosecution for more than three years.

When an exposure of the aircraft frauds was carried to Congress in 1922,[4] notwithstanding the attempts to block an investigation and hush up the matter, there was no government official who had the hardihood to deny the existence of these frauds. On the contrary, Congress met the issue by providing for a so-called War Frauds Division in the Department of Justice, and, beginning in 1922, made annual appropriations of $500,000 for the prosecution of such cases, until during the last Congress the Department of Justice asked and received an increase in the appropriation to $1,000,000. Outside of $1,500,000 returned to the Government by the Lincoln Motor Company after exposures made on the floor of Congress by Representative Roy O. Woodruff[5] and the settlement of a few other cases involving amounts of magnitude, the results have been desultory and unsatisfactory. In such important cases as the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation, the Standard Aircraft Companies, the American Bosch Magneto Company, the sound of official activity has been almost inaudible; and in many cases the statute of limitations in criminal prosecutions, which had been extended from three to six years in order that the Department of Justice should have ample time to act, has been allowed to expire for the second time without action.

Logical major considerations for the profiteer in planning, first, his escape and, later, a repetition of his offense are the facts that he will be winked at by the authorities, that the average independent and public-spirited citizen has little means of accurate inside knowledge of what is going on, and that many people forget tomorrow what they learn today. The same men who wrecked the Government's aircraft program during the war and got away with the spoils have continued to be awarded the Government's aircraft contracts without interruption up to the present day.[6] Not only has the will of Congress, evidenced by the appropriation of more than $2,000,000 of the people's money to insure prosecutions, been ignored, but aircraft companies charged with having received enormous amounts in overpayments on previous contracts have continued to receive new contracts without interruption. The Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation against which the then Assistant Secretary of War, J. M. Wainwright, on October 26, 1921, requested the Department of Justice to institute action to protect the Government's interest to recover alleged overpayments to the amount of $5,267,476.75, after changing its name to the Wright Aeronautical Corporation, in 1922 and 1923 received eighty-two contracts from the United States Air Service.[7]

On October 25, 1918, Charles E. Hughes recommended that Edward A. Deeds, who was in charge of the Government's aircraft production during the war, be tried by court martial for reprehensible conduct in acting as confidential adviser of H. E. Talbott, of the Dayton Wright Airplane Company, with respect to the transaction of business between that company and the division of the Signal Corps of which Colonel Deeds was the head.[8] The Dayton Wright company, of which Colonel Deeds was one of the incorporators,[9] after being exposed on the floor of Congress by Representative Roy O. Woodruff, was sued by the Department of Justice, on allegations of fraud, for the recovery of $2,408,267.41. After this suit was filed, this company received in 1922 and 1923, up to the time it went out of business, thirty government aircraft contracts.

At the beginning of the war the American pioneers, whose genius gave the art of flying to the world, were brushed aside and a group of companies was organized into an association known as the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association which took charge of the Government's aircraft business and has continued to control it until the present day.[10] Of the eighteen concerns which composed its membership two, the Standard Aircraft Corporation and the Standard Aero Company, were controlled by the Japanese banking house of Mitsui & Company, which was charged with being paymaster of the German secret service before we entered the war.[11] After the war these companies were charged with shipping American aircraft models and plans to Japan,[12] and they have been shown by official audits which have received overpayments, along with their associated American companies, in gigantic amounts.[13] While testifying before a Senate committee in April, 1924, in regard to the alleged disappearance from the plant of the Standard Aircraft Corporation of about 122 carloads of material and planes and parts of planes belonging to the United States Government, valued at more than $800,000, the papers of Thomas F. Lane, legal adviser of the chief of the Army Air Service, were seized,[14] and he was immediately discharged by the War Department.

Upon the organization of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association, two of its members who had been litigating over the Wright brothers' patents amicably settled their difference and through the so-called "cross-license agreement" originated by Mr. Howard E. Coffin, now a member of the President's aircraft board, and others, it was arranged that the United States Government should pay $2,000,000 royalties to these companies on patents, which rights had been sold to the British Government for £15,000. Through the operation of the cross-license agreement the pioneer manufacturers and inventors were forced out of business.

On August 22, 1922, the Thomas Senate committee, consisting of Senators Thomas, Reed of Missouri, Hoke Smith, New, and Frelinghuysen, filed the following unanimous report[15] in regard to the cross-license agreement, prophesying the aircraft conditions which exist today:

> The committee has not heard a word in approval of it. It is condemned by every aircraft manufacturer outside of the immediate beneficiaries. Those executing the license agreements have done so under protest because the aircraft board recommended or required it.
> Criticisms of it are numerous, the most serious of them being that it subjects manufacturers to onerous requirements, such as assessments for the use of plans and specifications, the purchase of the material and accessories from favored houses, the assignment and surrender of valuable patents and patentable devices to the Aircraft Association upon terms prescribed by itself, the discouragement of invention, and the inevitable control of the aircraft industry by that association or by some other interest through its agency. Your committee sympathizes with many of these sentiments, and notwithstanding the aircraft board as now officered no longer requires or recommends the execution of the agreements by contractors,[16] we believe the arrangement should be abrogated. We regard it as vicious and as designed to reap large profits by taking advantage of the necessities of the Government.

During the war, while Colonel Edward A. Deeds was at the head of the Government's aircraft production, Howard E. Coffin was president of the aircraft board, upon whose recommendation action was taken and contracts placed by the military authorities.[17] At the time the Thomas Senate committee was concluding its investigations, Mr. Coffin severed his official relations with the Government. For several years the report of the Thomas Senate committee, in whose membership there were able lawyers, was accepted by Congress as a correct disclosure until, within a few days from the time Mr. Coffin was appointed a member of the President's board to investigate the air services, the press reported an opinion delivered by Attorney General Sargent overturning these conclusions and approving the cross-license agreement and the conduct of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association.

When the recent aircraft investigations were looming on the horizon, among those early on the scene were Howard E. Coffin, president of the National Air Transport Co., Inc., and C. M. Keys, president of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation. On January 21, 1925, Mr. Coffin appeared before the Lampert aircraft committee and in his testimony[18] stated that he would like to quote from his statement in a former hearing on September 25, 1919, before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate: "The accomplishments of the War Department in aviation were easily among its best in the war."

The Lampert committee, apparently enlightened by the testimony of Coffin and Keys, failed to call to the witness-stand some fifty witnesses consisting of pioneer inventors and manufacturers who had been crushed and driven out of the aviation business.

During the hearings of the Lampert committee the Universal Service published the allegation that witnesses and newspaper men attending the hearings were being shadowed by agents of the Department of Justice. This statement was no doubt an injustice to the Attorney General; the man in charge of the espionage work was E. O. Irish, a former agent of the Department of Justice, no longer connected with it. On April 20, 1925, in the trial of the case, in the New York Supreme Court, entitled The People of the State of New York in the relation of Henry Woodhouse, plaintiff, vs. Aero Club of America, a spectator in the courtroom was suddenly called to the witness-stand and upon being asked his identity responded to the name of E. O. Irish. The following statements in his examination are taken from a transcript of the court's records:

Q. Will you state your business?

THE WITNESS: I object.

THE COURT: I will allow the question.

A. Investigator.

Q. For whom? A. Several.

THE COURT: Tell us who they are.

THE WITNESS: Howard E. Coffin.

Q. Next? A. Well, that is all I can say.

Q. You said several. Kindly state those. A. C. M. Keys, as far as I know.

Q. Who else do you represent?

THE COURT: Go on, tell us, what difference does it make?

A. As far as I know, Coffin and Keys, Howard E. Coffin and C. M. Keys.

Why is it necessary for men seeking to give information that might save their Government from final catastrophe to have their footsteps dogged when they enter temples of justice or the corridors of Congress? This is but a continuation of a damnable spy system which was fully exposed when it was shown that the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation was maintaining a Washington headquarters within ear-distance of the Department of Justice and was carrying on its pay roll 195 men who were actually being paid by the Government through a system of suppressed vouchers.[19]

In the meantime while the Department of Justice delays in the aircraft cases, is it possible that the advisers of the President of the United States have not informed him that representatives of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, of which C. M. Keys is the effective head, have been indicted for conspiracy to bribe and corrupt the authorities of government even in a foreign land? In the case of R E X vs. John Cyril Porte, William Augustus Casson, and Lyman J. Seely, the records in the Session House of Old Bailey, London, E. C., show that William A. Casson, an English barrister representing the Curtiss company, and Lyman J. Seely, who represented the Curtiss company in England, were indicted for a conspiracy to corrupt the British wing commander, John Cyril Porte, "to accept gifts as inducements or rewards for showing favor or disfavor to the Curtiss Aeroplane Company in relation to the affairs and business of the Crown." On November 19, 1917, Casson pleaded guilty to twelve counts in the indictment charging bribery and corruption and was sentenced to the maximum penalty of the law on each count. When Lyman J. Seely, the other representative of the Curtiss company, was called to the dock to answer the indictment, he was a fugitive from justice.

The following were among the remarks of Mr. Justice McCardie in passing sentence on Casson in the dispensation of British justice:

> William Augustus Casson, you have pleaded guilty to the twelve offenses charged against you.
> The crime of pecuniary corruption is gravely insidious; it saps the righteousness of the state. Honor is sacrificed for gold, duty is violated for gain, integrity is dissolved in the foul acid of secret bribery. I feel most deeply that my office of judge calls upon me to deal with a case in which a brother barrister is arraigned before me. For many years you have been a member of the English Bar, a body which prides itself on its high standards of personal honor. Its records have been stained today, though happily your case is in no way associated with any professional duty. . . .
> You are now in the winter of life. You have reached the age of 65. The burden of broken health has fallen upon you. In a letter which appeared in the evidence in this case in the court below I see that you wrote, not very long before the charge was made, "I have tried to live a useful life and can end it with content." The proceedings today are a tragic negation of that hope. For you, alas, the grave will close not on the memory of a stainless life but on the withering recollection of admitted crime and public disgrace. . . .

Shortly before the appointment of the President's aircraft board, Messrs. Coffin and Keys were reported by the press to have advised with the President; this event was followed by announcement of the personnel of the board, with Howard E. Coffin named as a member.

Has the President been imposed upon? When Howard E. Coffin and C. M. Keys have been and are now persons whose connections are within the scope of a fair and comprehensive investigation of the aircraft business, they are certainly disqualified to participate in the course of an inquiry that must be conducted by the entire country [illegible] partial disclosure.

With convenient smoke screens always available to raise a hue and a cry and obscure the issues, there have already been too many investigations that can be tersely expressed in the nursery rhyme:

"Mamma may I go out to swim?"
"Yes my darling daughter—
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
And don't go near the water."

[In his next article Captain Scaife will continue his discussion of the aircraft situation on the basis of the action of the Morrow committee and will point out an effective remedy for official whitewashes.]

Los Angeles's Campaign of Silence

By WILLIAM BOARDMAN KNOX

When a community has spent millions—as Los Angeles has spent them—to establish itself in the mind of the public as an earthly paradise, and when its continued prosperity depends on the maintenance of this tradition, it is only natural that it should be exceedingly jealous of its painfully acquired reputation. Therefore to say that the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce has been criminally culpable in forcibly preventing its own press and so far as possible that of the outside world from publishing conditions of plague and pollution existing there during the past summer would be inaccurate and unfair. It has only been human, loyal, protective of its own. It would also be inaccurate to state that the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce has disseminated untruths regarding conditions. What it has done was to undertake an immense and successful campaign of silence, forcing the Los Angeles papers into submission by overt threats of economic pressure and palliating the foreign press with generalities and pleasantly incomplete statistics. Los Angeles during the past summer has been gripped by an epidemic of infantile paralysis as extensive in proportion to population as the New York epidemic of ten years ago—yet no word of the situation has appeared in public print. On the contrary the parents of all America were bombarded with invitations to bring themselves and their children to Los Angeles for their summer vacation.

The fact also remains, substantiated by numerous reports on file with the Los Angeles Health Department, that the city has been and is today faced with a condition of water pollution characterized by her experts (notably Dr. Walter V. Brem, Los Angeles bacteriologist) as a constant menace to the health of her people; and that all attempts to remedy conditions proved abortive because the Chamber of Commerce has feared the "unfavorable effect on the East which criticism of our water situation would have at this time," and has blocked the publicity necessary to the arousal of popular demand. It must, however, be conceded in passing that there is a second and noisier school of experts who claim that the constant discovery of B. coli (colon bacilli) in Los Angeles reservoirs is a matter of no importance and that the water has all the healing properties of the pool of Bethesda.

Los Angeles boasts of her water supply; she has spent millions to bring it from the remote Owens Valley. But unfortunately her water comes from two sources, the Owens Valley Aqueduct and the Los Angeles River. The water is piped to seven major storage reservoirs within the city limits. Her supply from these two sources is ample. The water piped from the valley undoubtedly reaches the city pure. The water, however, obtained from the Los Angeles River, a shallow murky stream flowing through overcrowded industrial districts, is unspeakably filthy. The city reservoirs are, according to official reports, so poorly constructed as to leave the water constantly exposed to pollution from the drainage of the surrounding country. Whatever the cause, repeated tests by Dr. Brem and others have never failed to show the presence of B. coli, the red flag of pollution, in her principal reservoirs, and as long as this condition persists an isolated case or two of typhoid in a strategic locality could at any time start an epidemic that would sweep the city.

As to the relative importance of the infantile paralysis epidemic which swept the city last summer, with all its attendant threat of horror and deformity, figures from the California State Board of Health at Sacramento may be illuminating. Up to October 3, 1925, 700 cases of poliomyelitis (infantile paralysis) had been reported. According to Dr. George Parrish, Los Angeles health officer, not more than one case in five is properly diagnosed and reported. Accepting that basis we have a total for the State of 3,500 cases for the first ten months of 1925. Los Angeles, for which complete figures are not available, represents approximately one-third of the population of the State. Its proportion then should be 233 reported and 1,155 actual cases. This proportion is roughly borne out by her report for four weeks ending October 17, which gave her a total of 23 reported cases against a State total of 77, or slightly less than one third.

To fully appreciate the hysteria which this condition produced and the unreasoning yet effective methods employed for the suppression of facts, it is necessary to review a little Los Angeles current history.

Following a boom second in feverish activity only to that now going on in Florida, Los Angeles bankers late in 1923 decided on a policy of conservative retrenchment in an effort to avoid the acute depression usually following a period of inflation. It was to be a nice orderly process with no one getting hurt too much and no values affected materially.

Fate intervened. No sooner had business adjusted itself to arbitrarily imposed restrictions than the entire State of California was ravaged by the hoof-and-mouth disease. Bordering States set up rigid quarantines and in some States the militia was called out to prevent the passage of goods or people over the California border. Business collapsed. Before it had time to recover, bubonic plague appeared in Los Angeles in epidemic form. For weeks an entire portion of the city was roped off, and the exodus from southern California began to resemble a flight before an avenging army. By this time her whole economic structure was tottering. Land values dropped 50 per cent; bankruptcy courts were flooded with yesterday's millionaires; bank clearings were cut in half.

The advent of these catastrophes caught the guardians of southern California's destiny entirely unprepared. For nearly half a century they had been building one of the most effective machines for the distribution of propaganda that the world has seen, but they had sought no method for the suppression of news. It had never occurred to them that anything concerning southern California would ever need to be suppressed.

The East and Middle West, embittered by long years of smug and abusive propaganda, leaped upon the Los Angeles dispatches with shrieks of glee and banner lines. They had suffered in silence while every Eastern thunderstorm was played up as a death-dealing tornado and every snow flurry was labeled "Scores Die in Eastern Blizzard"; and their turn had come. What were a few death-dealing tornadoes more or less compared to plague and pestilence and economic ruin? Every line procurable was seized avidly and enlarged. Space writers in Los Angeles waxed fat—from Eastern newspapers.

The press agents of the erstwhile paradise reeled and grew sick. Such things were unthinkable, impossible, preposterous. There were hysterical meetings and feverish forming of committees. Money was appropriated for every hair-brained scheme designed to stem the tide. An iron-clad rule was established that no matter concerning Los Angeles should be published by the local press unless it was officially indorsed by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce. Two papers which had published stories which might be interpreted as detrimental to the city found themselves as bare of advertising as Mother Hubbard's cupboard and were only too glad to return in sackcloth and ashes to the fold. The climax of the chamber's assumption of power was perhaps reached when a candidate for mayor was forbidden to attack the administration of his rival on the ground that his remarks might be detrimental to the prestige of Los Angeles in the East—and obeyed the command meticulously. So, when the next crisis came, hysteria was fairly in the saddle with a well-oiled and tried machine to carry out its dictates.

It may be interesting to see this machine in action. Whatever its ethics, its efficiency deserves nothing but praise. It is no easy matter to gag the press of an entire nation. Yet not one word of conditions in Los Angeles during the past summer has appeared in print except one brief Associated Press dispatch from Sacramento and such carefully predigested generalities as the Chamber of Commerce itself from time to time saw fit to give out.

The crisis developed at the June meeting of the health and sanitation committee of the chamber. This committee of fifty was a heritage of the bubonic-plague epidemic, and theoretically its sole purpose was the protection and conservation of the health of the city. The meeting in question was presided over by James Woods, vice-president of the Biltmore Hotel Corporation and executive officer of the Los Angeles Biltmore, a man of sterling integrity and, given freedom of action, of great constructive ability.

Besides the committee members, W. H. Pridham, president of the chamber, was present, together with a scattering of "safe" newspaper men. It was obviously a badly frightened gathering before whom Pridham opened proceedings by demanding inviolable confidence of the newspaper men present and the statement that the committee was faced with a situation which must be handled with great delicacy if they were to prevent a flood of unfavorable publicity which might seriously interfere with summer-tourist business.

The "situation" was then given bluntly and in words of one syllable by Dr. George Parrish, Los Angeles health officer. Infantile paralysis had become epidemic in the city. Some twenty odd cases had been reported during the past two weeks, and there was every reason to expect that conditions would become more acute as summer progressed. Unless drastic steps were immediately taken the epidemic might easily assume the proportions of a catastrophe.

The reaction was immediate and, to a person uninitiated in Los Angeles psychology, astounding. Except for an isolated voice here and there which was quickly drowned in the general hubbub, no further mention was made of the epidemic as such. With the only hope of checking the spread of the disease resting in a frank educational campaign which should enable the parents of the city to use all possible means to protect their children, this body of men, who had voluntarily charged themselves with the physical welfare of the community, apparently occupied themselves only with discovering methods whereby conditions could be so minimized that business should not be hurt.

After all it is not hard to understand their viewpoint. What are a few broken children, probably of people who don't count anyway, compared to the welfare and prosperity of a great metropolis? The following typical remarks made at the meeting may accurately reflect the true booster's point of view in the face of a crisis:

"Of course we control the press of Los Angeles, but what are we going to do with outside papers?"

"We must take hold of the situation and interpret it properly, or unfavorable publicity may develop from irresponsible sources."

"We cannot conceal the situation, we must handle it constructively."

"If we formally recognize an epidemic Eastern papers will exaggerate it and our summer-tourist business will be ruined."

The final action of the committee was typical, brilliant. After going on record to the effect that no epidemic was at that time officially existent, a statement was prepared for the press which read roughly as follows:

> Communicable diseases in all communities show a tendency to increase during the summer.
> There have been sporadic cases of infantile paralysis throughout the entire country, including California.
> The Los Angeles Health Department therefore recommends that due caution be exercised by parents in exposing their children to possible contagion, but emphasizes the fact that there is no cause for alarm.

This was followed by a few directions for personal hygiene and signed by the health officer.

The above statement was characterized by committee members as fully apprising the populace of conditions and giving them ample opportunity to protect themselves without creating unnecessary apprehension. The price that Los Angeles paid in death and crippled children for her summer epidemic is a matter of record.

The story of water pollution and its suppression is identical except that it is longer, more tedious. The water situation is as it has been for seven years and will be until some one finds an opportunity to lay its basic facts before the public.

It took Los Angeles two years to gain sufficient courage to ask the federal government to take over its losing battle with plague control. Even then it attempted to exact from Rupert Blue of the United States public health service a pledge of secrecy. Today, although no human case of bubonic plague has appeared in Los Angeles since 1924 and the federal health officials are about to withdraw, the harbor of Los Angeles is still under quarantine as a plague-infected area.

Los Angeles has by her campaign of silence succeeded in maintaining a tottering prestige, but she has paid a heavy price. It will be interesting to see how much longer she will find suppression more profitable than correction.

Jobs for Women

By RUBY A. BLACK

THE American male breadwinner has received a grievous blow in the pocket-book.

As a result he has set up a plaintive, but clamorous, cry concerning pains in his altruism, his sympathy, his hope for the future, his love for the home, and various other of what he chooses to call his finer feelings. With the help of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor and other experts he has seized upon a new kind of gas bomb with which he may attack the camps of the encroaching female wage-earner. Says a representative of the Women's Bureau in a newspaper interview:

"Women cannot stand the strain of business hustle and bustle as well as men. Thousands of young women break down every year. Thousands of these broken-down young women marry and have children, or die in the attempt, in this condition of physical unfitness. Women are more able to stand the clamor and dust and fumes of the factory than the speed and responsibility and tension of office work. Women can stand any kind of work better than professional work, such as law, journalism, and medicine. (No mention is made of teaching in the primary and secondary public schools. This profession probably involves a greater nervous strain than either journalism or law, but men do not greatly care to engage in it.) Therefore all these bright young women, who would make good wives and mothers if they were not too proud and vain to do housework, become "nervous, sickly persons whom no one wants around."

Then along comes another authority to discourage women from economic independence. Mrs. Sarah Conboy confines her remarks to the married woman earning her own living, however. Mrs. Conboy is secretary of the United Textile Workers of America.

"I feel that a married woman has no right to take a job if her husband can support her. She is simply keeping some unmarried girl out of a job. . . . A woman has enough to do if she runs her home properly. To leave it deliberately for a job is a misfortune. And, if she has children, it's a crime," declares Mrs. Conboy. She and the journalist who interviewed her then click off the following movie of a "bride-stenog":

> At seven o'clock she is piling up the breakfast dishes in the kitchenette sink.
> At eight o'clock she's rushing pell-mell to catch the suburban special into town.
> At nine o'clock she sinks into her desk chair, all fussed out from the morning's rush, "fit" for the day's work.
> [A merciful veil is drawn over the next eight hours.]
> At five o'clock she's hanging on a strap in the subway, just about "all in."
> At seven o'clock she and hubby are extracting a delicatessen supper from sundry tins with a can opener.
> At eight o'clock she's washing up the egg-incrusted breakfast dishes that have lain in the sink all day.
> At nine o'clock when hubby suggests the movies she's yawning and yearning for eiderdown "comfies."

(It seems to be universally taken for granted that these weak young women must perform all the household tasks while earning a living in an office, although nobody would think of asking the stronger male to hold two such jobs.)

The persistence and violence of these protests against women's economic independence are due to various, and sometimes conflicting, causes. They arise partly no doubt in a real if misguided concern for the welfare of the race; but in large measure, especially among men, their source is a different worry. Since the war the number of women who earn incomes large enough to be taxed under the federal income-tax laws has tripled. The total income taxes paid by the 813,819 women filing separate returns in 1921 was approximately $113,000,000, on net incomes of $2,098,028,624.

The actual increase in the number of women gainfully employed was a half-million between 1910 and 1920. But taking into consideration the increase in population, the proportion of women gainfully employed really decreased 2.3 per cent in the decade. In 1910 23.4 per cent of all women over ten years old were gainfully employed, while in 1920 only 21.1 per cent of the entire feminine population were earning money. Thus the increase in the amount of taxable income reported by women must be due to an increase in earning power.

A bulletin issued by the Women's Bureau contains what I believe to be the explanation of the outcry against woman in business and the professions and industry. The bulletin ("The Occupational Progress of Women," by Mary V. Dempsey) states that women managers and superintendents of factories were nearly three and one-half times as numerous in 1920 as in 1910. The number of men performing similar functions did not even double during the period. There were eight times as many women officials of factories in 1920 as there were in 1910. The number of women manufacturers and officials in factories, taken together, increased 77.2 per cent, while the number of men manufacturers and officials decreased 11.4 per cent. In the ranks of skilled labor similar advances were shown by women. The number of women telegraph operators increased 105.1 per cent, while the number of men in the same craft was increasing only 1.4 per cent.

Women real-estate agents increased 214.6 per cent between the censuses, and women insurance agents 100.4 per cent. Women theater owners increased to four times the 1910 figure. Other occupations in which the numbers of women more than doubled in the ten years are: Bankers and bank officials, 152.8 per cent; agents, 289.1 per cent; accountants and auditors, 273.1 per cent; clerks (except in stores), 284.9 per cent; teachers of athletics and dancing, 246.9 per cent; college presidents and professors, 240.6 per cent; lawyers, judges, and justices, 211.5 per cent; religious, charity, and welfare workers, 202.9 per cent; chemists, assayers, and metallurgists, 196.0 per cent; opticians (retail dealers), 169.4 per cent; decorators, drapers, and window dressers, 163.1 per cent; laundry managers and officials, 143.3 per cent; United States officials (except postmistresses), 137.1 per cent; retail florists, 136.4 per cent; retail dealers (department stores), 134.5 per cent; librarians, 131.6 per cent; designers, 119.3 per cent; retail dealers (curios, antiques, and novelties), 112.3 per cent.

This is not half the list of occupations in which five hundred or more women were employed in 1920 which contained at that time more than twice as many women as in 1910.

While the number of women bank officials was increasing 152.8 per cent, the men in the same capacities were increasing only 43.7 per cent. While the women insurance agents were more than doubling, the men selling insurance increased only 33.6 per cent. Men real-estate agents and officials increased only 13.8 per cent, while the women thus engaged increased 214.6 per cent.

The number of women city officials and inspectors increased 57 per cent, while the number of men performing similar services decreased 0.9 per cent. Women county officials increased 107.1 per cent, while men officials increased only 7.8 per cent. Postmistresses showed an increase more than three times as great as the increase in postmasters.

In professional service, the only occupational groups in which the number of men increased proportionately more than the number of women were: Artists, sculptors, and teachers of art; healers, including osteopaths, physicians, surgeons, and all other persons professing to cure disease in any way except dentists; musicians and teachers of music; and officials of lodges, societies, et cetera.

While the number of actors and showmen was falling off 4.2 per cent, the number of actresses and show-women was growing 9.6 per cent. Miss Dempsey ponders heavily on the reason for this. Possibly she has not observed the progress of musical comedies and variety shows in recent years, and the competition in large choruses. Men authors, editors, and reporters decreased 1.2 per cent in the decade, while women journalists were increasing 40 per cent. The number of men serving as college presidents and professors increased only 83.6 per cent, while women teaching the youth in the institutions of higher learning increased 240.6 per cent. Women designers increased more than twenty times as rapidly as men designers. Women keepers of charitable and penal institutions showed an increase of 2,686, or 119.6 per cent, while men thus engaged increased by 2,707, or only 51.6 per cent. Women librarians multiplied more than ten times as fast as men librarians, and women photographers nearly forty times as fast as men in the same business.

No wonder men view with alarm!

The ungrateful females whom they brought into business and industry to perform the less remunerative tasks have, with utter lack of taste and business ethics, invaded the branches of work which they had always meant to keep for themselves. It is not good for the women's health. Anybody could see that, except an illogical woman.

In 1921 a man out of a job wrote a letter to an editor demanding that the State departments discharge all their married women and employ men instead. In 1923, in a State distant and totally different, a controversy on the subject raged in the "Everybody's Column" of a newspaper. Many single women complained that they had been crowded out of their jobs by married women, who, they alleged, could afford to take less money for their work because their husbands were helping support them. This may appear to contradict the statement of the New York employers that married women have more nerve with which to demand increases in salary or other recognition than the unmarried ones have. But one argument is doubtless as good as the other, and both are freely and impartially employed.

At least the unmarried women have the honesty to admit the economic motive behind their demand that married women be discharged to make room for unmarried women. It is short-sighted economics, because when married women go into business they make room for still other women in business by increasing the amount of domestic work which is thus forced out of the household into other women's hands. These unmarried women happily have the grace not to put their complaints on the ground of the welfare of the women they want ousted. They want the women's jobs, and they confess it. Why cannot the men who are excited about the dangers to women's health likewise admit that they want these women's jobs, now that women have begun to offer effective competition?

As long as some persons can profit by keeping women out of business and professional life a heavy barrage of propaganda will be directed against their entering it, and statistics will be piled up to show that it is harmful to women to engage in such work. It is easy to choose statistics. Some day, however, some man, or some woman, will start large corporations for household engineering, the sort of household engineering which no more involves the woman who lives in the house than the manufacture and upkeep of the automobile involves the man who uses it. Of course, it is troublesome and costly to buy an automobile and keep it in repair. Some attention has to be paid to its maintenance. So will the man and the woman have to pay some attention to the way their house or apartment is cared for. But no more than they do to their automobile.

When such corporations are formed a flock of statistics will be trotted out to prove that woman's health is so wrecked by difficult and uncongenial housework that she is incapable of the best motherhood and more or less unendurable as a daily companion. We shall be shown the appalling waste of individual housekeeping. We shall be shown how much more industry could be brought to our city if only women would work outside their homes and let the people who know how and who profit by it take care of their houses, their cooking, their clothes, and their child-training. We shall be shown how many more jobs would be provided for our young men and women if our system of household and personal service were more efficiently managed. We shall read in the Sunday supplements that it is a crime for an untrained mother to dare attempt to train her own child. We shall hear the cry of "Sissy" flung at the woman known to do her own sewing. The woman who troubles to do her own housework will be known as an eccentric with a strange and expensive hobby, just like the man who insists on repairing his own automobile. The woman who accepts a living from her husband while she does nothing productive will be as much a social outcast as was the alimonied divorcée of the nineties.

You will then believe all these things, just as you are today convinced that it is a callous mother who would leave her child in the care of a trained teacher-nurse while she prepares a brief or edits a newspaper, and that a woman's prospects for happy marriage and motherhood are ruined when she earns her own living in the way she chooses.

Nothing is easier than choosing statistics.

Power to Decide, None to Enforce

By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

HISTORY does, after all, repeat itself. The question whether we shall enter the World Court, and on what terms, has aspects strangely similar to one of the most puzzling problems which faced the gentlemen who, in the hot summer of 1787, wrote the Constitution of the United States.

That problem revolved around the Supreme Court. It will be recalled that the thirteen original States were thirteen high and mighty, chauvinistic, independent nations. Prior to the Revolution disputes between the Colonies—and there were some sharp ones—had been referred to the Crown. Under the Confederation, machinery had been set up similar to that of the Hague Tribunal for arbitration of controversies between the States. It proved unsatisfactory. When the Fathers met in Philadelphia they recognized the acute need of a permanent court of justice to adjudicate differences between States. So we find the world-famous provision in the Constitution creating a Supreme Court and giving that court authority to decide controversies between the States. The clause is today a commonplace, but in 1787 such a grant of power to a court to decide issues between sovereigns was a daring and unprecedented act.

But another question, even more troubling perhaps, faced the Fathers. How about the enforcement of a decree against a State? If the decree was to be capable of enforcement somebody had to be authorized to call out an army against the delinquent State. This would mean war. If, per contra, the decree was incapable of enforcement, what good was it? This was a tremendous question. As we face the World Court problem today, that same question looms even larger.

In 1918, writing his opinion in the noted case of Virginia vs. West Virginia,[1] Chief Justice White declared that contemporary records failed to disclose that the Fathers considered this problem of enforcement. The learned jurist was in error. The Virginia Plan for a Constitution provided for calling "forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfil its duty." That provision was, however, not included in the Constitution, and Madison's observations tell the reason why:

> The more he reflected on the use of force [wrote Madison] the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, the efficacy of it. . . . A union of states containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look like a declaration of war.[2]

Hamilton, Ellsworth, and Marshall expressed similar views. The New Jersey Plan for a Constitution also proposed force against delinquent States, but the counsel of such men as Madison evidently prevailed, for the Constitution sets up no apparatus for enforcement of the decrees of the Supreme Court against States.

Hence we find that a novel court was erected in 1787; a court having jurisdiction to decide controversies between sovereigns, but without a sheriff to enforce such decisions; the anomaly of a court with broader jurisdiction yet less power—if power be measured by armed force—than any other court in the world's history.

What has been the court's career in the one hundred and forty years which have elapsed? A detailed answer to that question would require far more space than can here be allowed.[3] Let me summarize then:

(a) Until 1918 the Supreme Court, which had by then sat in over forty cases where State sued State, not only never attempted to exert power over a State but, when called on to discuss that question, invariably declared it had no such power.[4]

(b) In 1918, however, Chief Justice White, in the West Virginia case, declared that "judicial power essentially involves the right to enforce."

But did he try to enforce? Did he send a sheriff to the State of West Virginia? He did not. He pleaded with West Virginia to acquiesce voluntarily in the court's decrees and so save everybody from an embarrassing and disagreeable situation. If you doubt me, read his opinion. So we find that there has never been an instance in our history where an attempt has been made to enforce a Supreme Court decision against a State by the exertion of power.

During these one hundred and forty years all manner of interstate controversies have come before the Supreme Court—boundary disputes, economic quarrels, all the typical and favorite war-breeding issues; they have been resolved by the court and peaceably acquiesced in by the States, except in a few rare cases in our earlier history where, the States declining to acquiesce, the decrees were not enforced. Fortunately so, for an attempt to enforce would surely have resulted in war.[5]

History repeats itself, I said. We are faced with the problem of entry into the World Court. The World Court, as now constituted, is backed by the power of the League. That is the reasonable construction to be put upon Article 13 of the Covenant of the League as I endeavored to point out last week. The history of the Supreme Court of the United States discloses not only that a court lacking power to compel the enforcement of its decisions against a sovereign can serve a useful purpose, but, much further, that the only kind of World Court which can be of any real use is a court stripped of such power; for once the court is backed by power it becomes by that very fact a court of arms instead of a court of justice.

Hence the Senators of the United States, in considering the question of entry into the World Court as presently constituted, have a nice question before them as to the exact language of the reservations and conditions pursuant to which we should enter the court, lest we find ourselves members of a court of arms instead of a court of justice. What should those reservations be? That is the question with which the Senate of the United States will presently have to wrestle. An answer to it will be suggested in a concluding article next week.

The Only Hope in France

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, November 16

THE French financial problem will not be solved until the nature of that problem is better understood in France. All French parties are agreed on two points—that there must be no inflation by a further issue of bank-notes and that prices are too high and must be brought down. On these points the Socialists join hands with the Temps and the Echo de Paris. The Socialists have refused to agree to a small issue of bank-notes to repay the three-year bonds falling due on December 8 with the result that they are to be subjected to what is in fact a moratorium. Their holders have the choice of accepting in return Bons de la Défense Nationale at three, six, or twelve months, a security that can be used for paying taxes next year, or new three-year bonds repayable on December 8, 1928. That, at least, is what is now proposed. The Temps fulminates against any further issue of bank-notes in any circumstances, but also objects to any alternative. The solution of the financial problem, according to the Temps, is very simple. All that is necessary is "a Government that governs with due regard for the national honor and in accordance with the fundamental principles of civilization and progress." This does not seem very helpful in a crisis like the present. There are many ways of applying the "fundamental principles of civilization and progress," whatever they may be, to questions of currency and finance.

What the Temps probably means is that, if confidence were restored, the holders of short-term bonds would go on renewing them indefinitely and taking more. The pleasant financial method of the Bloc National—piling up budget deficits and covering them by short-term loans—could then be renewed and all would be well. This is the note of the whole Opposition press. M. Caillaux has destroyed confidence by telling the truth about the financial situation, or, as they put it, by libeling his predecessors, and by proposing to make the rich pay taxes, which is an attack on property. There is no financial crisis. The crisis is political and is due to lack of confidence. If only the Bloc National came back to power, the franc would soar, prices would go down, and everybody would be happy. These writers seem to forget that during M. Poincaré's premiership the franc on one occasion fell to its present value. But that, of course, was due to a malignant conspiracy against France and her flag, not to the financial methods of the Bloc National.

It is a pity that party feeling should so blind people to facts. There has, in fact, been a certain revival of confidence during the last six months, but no amount of confidence could alter the situation created by the reckless financial policy of the last eleven years—for the primary cause of the present situation was the refusal to impose adequate taxation during the war. All parties are to blame to some extent for the situation. The Herriot Government did not, as they should have done, face the situation when they came into power, tell the country the truth about it, and at once try to put it right. Instead, they drifted until their own situation became impossible. Nevertheless, by far the greatest responsibility for the French financial crisis is that of the successive governments that ruled France from 1914 to 1924, especially the post-war governments of the Bloc National. M. François-Marsal and M. de Lasteyrie, both of whom were finance ministers of the Bloc National, have been giving their opinions on the situation. They, of course, denounce inflation as ruinous, but what do they call the makeshifts into which they were driven by the policy of putting more than half the national expenditure into extraordinary and extra-extraordinary budgets, with no revenue to balance it, and even then failing sometimes to balance the ordinary budget? It is astonishing that anybody in his senses could suppose that such a system could be continued indefinitely. It is not the fault of the present Government that it has had to meet obligations that M. François-Marsal and M. de Lasteyrie bequeathed to their successors without making the smallest provision for meeting them. Nor is it lack of confidence that makes many holders of short-term bonds present them for repayment, but merely the fact that they need the money. When people take short-term bonds, it is because they do not wish to invest the money permanently, since they know that they will need it sooner or later. The truth is that the capacity of the French épargne has been exhausted by all the loans of the last eleven years and there is no more money available to lend to the state. It was inevitable that this should happen some time.

This being so, it is clear that drastic measures are necessary. All that the Opposition have to propose is more indirect taxation—although the indirect taxes are already about four-fifths of the whole national revenue—or the consolidation of the floating debt on ruinous terms. M. de Lasteyrie, for example, suggests that the holders of short-term bonds should be offered a loan at 6 per cent, free not only from income tax but also from death duties up to a certain amount. In the Temps on November 12 Professor Jean-Louis Faure proposed a tax of 5 per cent on all purchases of every kind, except those of wheat and bread, to be paid by the purchaser and levied by a stamp affixed to the bill, the article itself, or the paper in which it was wrapped. This proposal the professor declared to be inspired by the "elementary truth" that people should be taxed on what they spend, not on what they earn—a most comfortable policy for the wealthy miser. It would be quite easy, Professor Faure thought, even for a workman earning £1 a week to pay such a tax, especially since it would lead to a rise in the value of the franc and, therefore, a reduction of the cost of living and general prosperity.

It is amazing that a professor should imagine that the cost of living would be reduced by the return of the franc to par, which he apparently believes possible. This delusion is, however, almost universal in France, although the experience of the stabilization of the mark should have shown its absurdity. After the stabilization of the mark retail prices rose in Germany about 400 per cent in a few weeks. Naturally, the rise would be far smaller in France, where gold prices have not fallen to the German level, but there would inevitably be a rise. Moreover, it is desirable that there should be. The franc is now worth about 21 centimes, the general wholesale index number for October was 584 and the index of retail prices in Paris 433. This abnormal state of things can hardly continue indefinitely, but nobody here seems to recognize even that retail prices are low. The Temps said last Sunday that the "profound causes" of the present trouble were the depreciation of the franc and the rise in prices. Socialists and Communists talk in much the same way. As I have said, all parties are agreed that prices must be reduced, that is to say, they [illegible].

Nobody, to my knowledge, has suggested that perhaps [illegible] to stabilize the franc and return to the gold standard, not, of course, to attempt to bring the franc back to par but to stabilize it at its present value, or some convenient approximate value, say 20 centimes. [illegible] would be much more easy than was the stabilization of the mark in November, 1923, but, of course, it would involve unpleasant consequences for a time. When, however, a surgical operation is necessary, the sooner it is performed the better. It might be desirable to issue a new transitional currency to a fixed amount, for internal use only, on the lines of the German Rentenmark, which for a time could be used side by side with the existing currency and be interchangeable with it at the rate of one new franc for five old ones. This would, of course, be a limited internal inflation, but nobody would know it in France, and probably such an inflation once and for all is necessary in present conditions, as part of the process of stabilization. At any rate, the experience of Germany and many other countries has shown that, until the currency is stabilized, all schemes of financial restoration are vain.

In the Driftway

A LETTER published lately in the New York World attempts to shatter another of the few familiar myths which are left to us. Queen Marie Antoinette, it seems, did ask "Why do they not eat cake?" when told that her subjects had to do without bread; but she was far from meaning what her words are generally thought to mean. Gateau, or cake, so the letter alleges, meant a coarse kind of buckwheat cake; and bread, in those days, was a great delicacy. Thus it was quite natural for the royal lady to inquire why her humblest subjects did not content themselves with the humblest fare. All this is as it may be. Marie Antoinette was probably not the simple little fool that history has tried to make her out; just as George Washington was not the sort of boy who would say to his father: "I cannot tell a lie; I did it with my little hatchet." But these things should be kept from the public. They should be allowed to keep their illusions about heroes and heroines; if once the truth gets about that these great personages are very like everyone else, what will become of history or romance?

AS the Drifter has often pointed out, however, romance is still going strong. From the advertisement of a Florida development company he takes the following choice extracts:

> The Cloister Inn will open in January under the management of [illegible] on Lake Boca Raton, offering Broadway talent. One of the largest radio-broadcasting stations in the country is being constructed there. And an ancient cathedral is being brought over from Spain to be erected there in memory of the promoter's mother.

This is surely going Mr. Henry Ford one better, for he has as yet done nothing but bring piecemeal and erect on his property a New England inn or two. The time may come when the Coliseum will rest quietly on top of the Palisades, when the waters of Lake Michigan will reflect the Parthenon, when the Forum will be a side-show of Coney Island. Then it will be proper to begin carrying off American antiques—when time creates them—to Brazil, perhaps. The Drifter has no doubt that the largest grain elevator in the world would look well on the banks of the Amazon.

A HORRIBLE example of what might appear in the daily papers instead of the crime news that causes so many people to shudder is offered by two newspapers in the Far West, edited for the day by a group of clergymen and of club-women, respectively. The clergymen minimized news of violence and law-breaking, censored advertising copy, omitted dance advertising, and featured articles about institutions doing humanitarian work. Not content with this, each pastor-editor contributed an editorial on good-will; and a statement from Charles Evans Hughes on the front page urged the need for tolerance in America. The club-women banished crime news from the front page, eliminated all but one—the "least offensive"—of the comic strips, and omitted serial stories. The Drifter has seen neither of the papers in their chastened form, but to him they sound like examples of horrifying dulness. This is not the way to abolish interest in crime; rather it would inspire any otherwise peaceable citizen with a desire to assassinate all such editors. Far better Boca Raton and the imported Spanish cathedral than four editorials on good-will.

Pasadena, California, November 2 UPTON SINCLAIR

Anita Whitney and the Courts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you permit a few words of comment on your editorial Guilt by Association in which you discuss, in your issue of November 4, the dismissal by the Supreme Court of the Whitney case "for want of jurisdiction"? I hope I need not say that the California syndicalism act and all its kind violate those traditions of American tolerance and freedom of opinion which President Coolidge celebrated in his speech the other day to the American Legion. Nor need I express my sense of grief that any American governor should withhold his power of grace from such a devoted spirit as Miss Whitney and actually allow her to go to jail. Your editorial, however, raises an important issue in regard to the Supreme Court's relation to the Whitney case. You criticized the Supreme Court for failing to take jurisdiction of the case and assert that "lawyers who are neither inexperienced nor naive with respect to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court find the Whitney dismissal puzzling."

As you pertinently remark, "the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is a fairly technical matter." The issue must therefore be judged by those versed in the technical law. Judged by the settled doctrines of the Supreme Court, the record in the Whitney case debarred assumption of jurisdiction by the court for the all-sufficient reason that the Supreme Court of California, in sustaining the conviction of Miss Whitney under the California statute, had not denied any federal right which had been "specially set up or claimed in the State court" by Miss Whitney. The claims in counsel's brief, to which you refer, cannot possibly furnish basis for jurisdiction. The only specific claim of federal right in the record of the Whitney case was a certificate of the California Court of Appeals filed two and a half years after the record of the case had been filed in the Supreme Court at Washington. Such a certificate, it is settled, cannot originate a federal right. Such a certificate might be availed of to make more certain that which was in the record; it cannot put in the record what wasn't there when the State court finally adjudicated.

All this may sound extremely technical and to some extent, of course, it is. But behind the so-called technicalities of appellate procedure lie grave questions of power by the Supreme Court over the concerns of the individual States. The Nation has frequently criticized the Supreme Court for undue intervention in State affairs. Nor can we be too alert in our watchfulness of the most delicate mechanism in our governmental system, namely, the control through the Supreme Court of State legislation and State adjudication. Nothing is more important than to safeguard the exercise of this delicate power by a carefully defined system of procedure under which the Supreme Court may review State court decisions, and a strict adherence to these rules. That is precisely what the Supreme Court did in refusing to take jurisdiction in the Whitney case, although it saw fit not to spell out the ground of its inability and merely to refer to the governing statute in the light of the record and of the authorities with which lawyers "neither inexperienced nor naive with respect to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court" are supposed to be familiar.

Cambridge, Mass., November 11 FELIX FRANKFURTER

[The views of so distinguished a legal scholar as Professor Frankfurter are entitled to much weight. But other lawyers, also well read in the Supreme Court's jurisdictional precedents, fail to find in them a conclusive explanation of the Whitney dismissal. Irrespective of the form of the antecedent record, the Supreme Court has ruled that "where a State court holds that a federal question is made before it, according to its practice, and proceeds to determine it, this court will regard the question as duly made." (Miedreich vs. Lauenstein, 232 U. S. 236, 243.) The amended remittitur which the California Court of Appeal undertook to make part of its record in the Whitney case declared positively that that court had in fact considered and adjudicated the federal constitutionality of the statute under which Miss Whitney was convicted. Prior practice of the Supreme Court gave ground for confidence that that court would take jurisdiction. (Consolidated Turnpike Co. vs. Norfolk & Ocean View Railway Co., 228 U. S. 596, 599; Marvin vs. Trout, 199 U. S. 212, 223; Rector vs. City Deposit Bank, 200 U. S. 405, 412.) In the absence of an opinion by the Supreme Court, the accumulated precedents, from which it did not see fit to specify any as controlling, leave the ground of decision far from satisfactorily clear.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

William Montgomery Brown

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The accounts I have read of William Montgomery Brown's trial fail to shed any light on your assertion [October 21, page 449] that the bishops in their inability to draw the line between permissible and unpermissible interpretations of the creeds fell back, as you assert, on the sacred fourth-century words of the liturgies as "doctrine" to which a bishop must subscribe. They did insist that the articles of the creed are to be accepted in the sense in which they were probably imposed, whether that sense is literal or figurative, and that symbolical reinterpretation cannot mean repudiation of the very thing interpreted. I should be interested to learn just what liturgies they fell back upon for "doctrine," "fourth-century words," as you describe them. The bishops rested upon the Catholic creeds and the first four ecumenical councils; and in doing so the Episcopal church in America sacrificed none of its traditions. Has it ever built up the tradition by even one precedent of allowing its bishops to promulgate in season and out of season a propaganda deeply prejudicial to the teachings of the church?

If you demand such of the church (and the tone and temper of your editorial implies that you do) then you are in logic bound to deny any organization the right to exercise control over its membership. All constitutional and parliamentary law recognizes the right of the organization to prescribe conditions and regulations over its membership, and to most clear-thinking people an organization is not considered impossible and bigoted if it exercises that control over individuals who have ceased to adhere to their corporate obligations and promises.

Even in the political world (where the analogy is not quite exact, because parties are not fixed in doctrine and organized like the church) it is considered poor taste, if not indefensible, for a man to be a communist, say, and do what he can to destroy the Socialist Party of which he remains a member; and, as I remember, The Nation has more than once made caustic and just criticism of those Northwestern Senators and Representatives who like to be counted as Republicans when it comes to committee assignments but who rant and rave about the G. O. P. to their constituents back home at primary and election time. Victor Berger was the only one of their school in the last Congress who could stand on his two feet with entire self-respect and tell them that they couldn't eat their Republican cake and have it too. I think the common sense is all with Mr. Berger and the common sense would also have been with Mr. Brown had he resigned his official position in the church when he came to repudiate as false her position which he had vowed to uphold when he was ordained to her teaching and priesthood.

The church has robbed William Montgomery Brown of nothing; she has merely refused to let him continue his misrepresentation of her standpoint and doctrines while holding the position of bishop and priest.

Wilson and Lodge

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to point out an error in Mr. Hard's extremely "neutral" review of the late Senator Lodge's book on the Senate and the League of Nations Covenant [November 4]. According to Mr. Hard, Grey, the British foreign minister, found the Lodge reservations "acceptable." This is not true. What Grey said was that the reservations would not, in practice, prevent full and active American participation in the work of the Council and Assembly of the League. He thought that the American members of the League's agencies would forget or ignore the reservations when dealing with vital and grave issues, and he very much wanted America in the League, terms or no terms.

Grey was right, and so were the other Europeans who, while objecting to the nullifying Lodge reservations, advised acceptance of them by President Wilson and his pro-League followers. But, as we have learned since, Wilson had his own reasons for rejecting the reservations. Europe might swallow them, but he found them incompatible with constitutional provisions covering the power and province of the Executive, and he was far too conscientious to acquiesce in violations of the Constitution. He vetoed a budget bill for like reasons, though he favored a federal budget. Time may yet completely vindicate him.

What Lodge thought, or said he thought, of Wilson is matter of no consequence whatever, and a Nation reviewer might have recognized that fact. Lodge never performed an unselfish act, never originated or helped originate a liberal or constructive measure, and never revealed any knowledge of the political and social sciences. He was a reactionary and a pedant. When Roosevelt foolishly suggested his name to the Republican Convention of 1916 for the presidential nomination, even that far from progressive body stared, smiled, and shrugged its shoulders. Lodge never had an ideal and never inspired affection or enthusiasm. To compare him with Wilson —despite the latter s temperamental shortcomings—is to outrage every liberal and radical sentiment.

The talk of Wilson's failure makes judicious radicals weary. It is the opposition to him that failed. Wilson made many mistakes, but he did give the world the League of Nations, and sooner or later America will follow Ireland and Germany and enter that League. Impossibilists and standpatters are doomed to defeat. The true pacifist is a staunch friend of the League and all its works. The Dawes Plan, Locarno, Balkan peace today, and other hopeful and promising achievements all owe their existence to the League, and hence to Wilson.

The purpose of the collection is that of a clearing-house to establish permanent files of the individualistic literature that was printed and presented by Tucker and others at that time.

I should be very glad if any of the readers of The Nation who have any Tucker publications, and particularly individual numbers or complete files of Liberty and Spooner pamphlets which they may wish to exchange for other similar material, would communicate with me [112 West Adams Street] so that their needs and their offerings can go through the clearing-house.

An Appeal for Holzapfel

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A tragic fate menaces one of our prominent thinkers and investigators. The creator and founder of the new scientific psychology of the "Pan-Ideal," Rudolf Maria Holzapfel, is exposed to imminent danger by a serious disease and the economic consequences of the war. The continuation and completion of a new and monumental work to which he has devoted more than twenty years of labor and which will crown his life, is thus put in jeopardy. The life and work of such a man must under all circumstances be saved and secured.

Contributions will be received by the Emergency Society for German and Austrian Art and Science. Checks should be made payable to James Speyer, treasurer, and sent to Professor F. W. T. A Menshevik on Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been a constant reader of your, I'll say our, Nation since the day I learned the English language well enough to understand and digest what I read. I always find pleasure in reading it, as I always find the truth in it about life in the United States, which is strange to me to a certain extent. The Nation helps me out a great deal.

I am also often delighted at the way you deal with the affairs of my old country, Russia, in your editorials, articles, and correspondences, having one ultimate aim: to get as near to the truth as possible and share it with the readers.

Knowing that, I asked myself if it wouldn't be of interest to the readers of The Nation to see a letter of a student in Russia, a married man in the thirties, active in political life, Menshevik by faith, but a loyal citizen. He lives in Kazan. The letter is to his brother in Brooklyn. Here it is, in part:

> It is much better now, economically and politically. If there was a question till now how and where to get bread, dry bread, this question gives place now to other, higher requirements of life, to a standard which is not far away from that of Europe or your own country.
> There is not a trace left of what was known as "war communism." It is a thing of the past. Every citizen may express whatever opinion he wants to, without interference. You know that there was a cleaning of the undesirable element in the student body. (Luckily I escaped, as you know.) And I must say that the majority of the expelled students were of the "black hundreds." Now, imagine, by a decree of the central government, they are all reinstated, no matter what class they belong to, or what political opinion they have.
> The relation of the government to the intelligentsia is very friendly. They appreciate our work and prize us. They give special privileges to the so-called spetz (intelligent worker specialist). And in order to secure a high and responsible position you should not belong to the Communist Party. You should have a head on your shoulders and ability to do work. The old system of spying on and controlling non-communist workers is long forgotten.

I hope that you will publish this very interesting letter.

Disarmament in Denmark

By JULIUS MORITZEN

WHILE the Danish military maneuvers this year are on a scale but little in consonance with the Government's announced intention to reduce the army to a minimum, the prospects of a heated debate in the Rigsdag are every day growing more certain as regards a carrying out of the governmental program. Whether or not new elections will take place in the spring is a question that the leading politicians are themselves unable to answer at this moment. The political pot is at the boiling-point and the whole country is in a waiting attitude.

Recent utterances by the Minister of Defense, M. Rasmussen, intended more for foreign ears than Danish, have nevertheless brought the question of disarmament once more very strongly to the fore. It is his intention, declared M. Rasmussen, to place the disarmament plan of the Government before the Folketing on the assembling of the Rigsdag, where he has the assurance that it will be accepted by that body. He feels, however, that it will not fare so well in the Landsting, and the most natural course would be, in his opinion, to take a popular vote. However, this will scarcely be possible since both the Conservative and the Left parties are against such a procedure.

"But what then?" M. Rasmussen asks and goes on to answer his own question: "In accordance with the constitution we cannot dissolve the Landsting, and the new elections to this body do not occur until 1928. We might dissolve the Folketing, and there might be some reason for this action as the election in 1924 did not turn on the disarmament question but the currency regulation. But even while we might have a majority in the present Folketing for disarmament, we might easily fail of a majority in the new election. If the Landsting will agree to a Folketing election that exclusively concerns the disarmament question we can have the election at once. But that is just what the Landsting will not do.

"The Radicals do not hide their wish for politics to remain in status quo, although I still believe that the political situation will be such later as to lead to a Folketing election in the spring. But remember, we are not simply going to carry through laws written by the Radicals. If it comes to a Folketing election, then as a matter of course the disarmament proposition will play a major part."

When he was asked about a former expression by the Minister of Defense that he would be indifferent to the attitude of foreign nations in the matter of the disarmament proposal, an expression that had found its way into the foreign press and been made the subject of ambassadorial reports, M. Rasmussen replied: "As far as the reports of the ambassadors to their home governments are concerned, I can only say that these show that the foreign conservative and the nationalistic circles naturally look upon the proposal in anything but a favorable light, while it is greeted with the more satisfaction and as a good example the further we turn to the Left. But all this we knew beforehand. The voices that have reached us from without have had neither a positive nor a negative effect on me.

"And let me repeat: I am indifferent to the attitude of foreign nations. For instance, if a general proposition comes from Geneva to maintain the status quo with regard to military preparations until a disarmament conference is called, such a call would be of great importance to us. But I don't look for such a call, and as far as I can see, neither in Geneva nor any other place has anything happened that operates against our disarmament policy."

"But is it not a fact," M. Rasmussen was asked, "that the situation in the Baltic has become more restless and Denmark's position as a consequence more precarious?" "Very well, let us speak plainly," was the quick answer. "You are thinking of the possibility of an English-Russian collision, with which the European press has busied itself. What will our attitude be in such a case when we have a defense organization? England can demand that we close the Sound and the Belts against the Russians. If we do this we are immediately in the fray as the allies of England. Or contrariwise, Russia can demand that we close these waters, in which case we will be placed in the Russian column.

"There is a third possibility, that we refuse to close the Sound and the Belts. In that case either party to the conflict would attend to the closing and this would result in the landing of foreign troops on Seeland and Fünen. Thus when we possess a military organization we are in duty bound to defend our neutrality and are at once drawn into the war.

"You ask if, in case of the absence of a military organization the situation would give cause for a race between England and Russia as to which will get there first? Yes, that is of course true enough. But remember, I have never said that disarmament would guarantee Denmark against becoming a theater of war. What I have said is that it will be much more dangerous for Denmark to be drawn into the war if we have a military organization than if we have not. The present military organization—that of 1922—is worse than none. It cannot defend us. It can only bring about unnecessary bloodshed.

"I repeat: Should it come to a collision between England and Russia in the Baltic a disarmed Denmark—and according to our proposal we will have no mines for placing in the Sound and the Belts—a disarmed Denmark, I say, will be in a much less dangerous position than a Denmark compelled to offer a hopeless defense of its neutrality."

"But do you not admit that the attempt itself, the will to defend independence has a moral and also a real political importance?" M. Rasmussen was asked. "No, I do not. And I will tell you why. I can best illustrate it with a concrete example. We have discussed an English-Russian conflict in the Baltic. On land we might be attacked on the south. According to our military law of 1922 we could place 60,000 men in the field there. But the experiences of the World War have taught us that for the defense of such a frontier 300,000 men are required for any length of time, and for a shorter period 150,000 men might answer the purpose. The 60,000 men we possess mean nothing, and would be swept away in no time.

"I honestly believe that we will gain the world's sympathy more readily by owning up to our military impotence. I believe further that in a given situation a helpless and disarmed Denmark would gain assistance quicker than a Denmark with a merely fictitious defense."

The Conservative press has not been slow to bring its attack to bear on the Minister of Defense, and both as regards the disarmament proposal and the possibility of a spring election, questions were asked of Premier Stauning as to the latter's views now that his colleague had expressed himself so positively. Whether or not the relations between the Social Democratic regime and the Radical Left would weather the crisis and the combination carry on for any length of time the arrangement that alone led to the victory of the Social Democratic Party in the last election is a matter concerning which all political parties in Denmark are in doubt.

Premier Stauning said that the difficulties continually placed by the Landsting in the way of a general election were evidently responsible for the remarks of his colleague, the Minister of Defense. But there could be no question at all, he declared, that the policy agreed to at the time of the forming of the present Cabinet would be maintained unchanged.

"As for the fate of the disarmament proposal," Premier ning added, "I am of the opinion that the discussions carried on in the League of Nations are bringing the question a step nearer an answer, and it follows as a matter of course that these discussions will exert their influence in our country and it is to be hoped also in the Landsting. I have not as yet given up the hope that the Left party out of regard for its voters will take part in solving the problem that of course belongs to the future."

A New Soviet Marriage Law

THE summary by D. Kursky, People's Commissar for Judicial Affairs, printed below, of the Soviet marriage law which is to supersede the law of 1918 was taken from International Press Correspondence for October 22.

In the first months of its existence, the Soviet power, by its decree on Divorce, on Civil Marriage, on Children, and on the Keeping of a Register of Births, Marriages, and Deaths, published on December 19 and 20, 1917, introduced far-reaching changes in the domain of legislation with regard to marriage and the family. As Comrade Lenin pointed out in 1919 in his speech at the conference of the working women of Moscow, civil law, even in the most progressive countries, has exploited the weaker position of woman particularly in the field of marriage law by not giving her equal rights but putting her at a disadvantage. The indissoluble legal marriage with unequal rights, which according to the arrangement of bourgeois lawyers represents principally a community of goods in which the husband alone has the right of guidance and disposal, i.e., in which he has the right to force on the woman his place of residence, nationality, and family name, the right to a decisive voice in the education of the children, etc.—this marriage, as well as the "religious sanctification" of this slavery, was abolished by revolutionary legislation.

The decrees mentioned as well as the law with regard to the registration of births, marriages, and deaths in 1918, which was entirely based on them, determ ne the fundamental attitude of the Soviet power as regards marriage and family law. The statute book of 1918 first of all deprived religious marriage of all legal significance and established civil marriage; it further established complete equality of rights of both parties to the marriage and of both parents, as well as the right of divorce in accordance with the will of one of the two partners, also the divisibility of goods, combined with mutual financial support. What is most important, it assured complete equality in the position of the children of a registered and of an actual marriage. This law created a whole system of legal relations and was in force for about seven years without any changes worth mentioning, with the exception of the simplification of some entries in the register of births, marriages, and deaths.

The draft of the new code of law regarding marriage, the family, and guardianship, worked out by the People's Commissar for Justice in accordance with the resolution passed at the last meeting of the Central Executive Committee, was previously sent out to the subordinate offices and dealt with in detail by the commissions of the Council of People's Commissars and by the Council of People's Commissars itself. Now that a number of changes have been made, it will be submitted to the next meeting of the Central Executive Committee.

The draft differs from the code of 1918 chiefly in its construction. Whereas the existing code concentrates attention in its very first paragraphs on the creation of organs for registration, in other words, on the formulation of the circumstances of marriage and the family, the present draft puts these formal factors in their proper place and concentrates attention on the material factors, i.e., on the laws which determine the rights and duties arising from the circumstances of marriage and the family, regardless of whether these relations have or have not been sanctioned by form (registered).

The bill attributes to the official formulations of marriage no other significance than that of a testification to a definite fact, in order to facilitate the proof in cases where rights have to be protected: for instance, when maintenance is demanded, when the right of inheritance has to be determined, etc. In this way the foundation of the previous code, according to which only civil marriages which are entered in the register establish rights and duties, has now become superfluous. In the present draft the equality of material rights and duties resulting from matrimonial relationship, independently of its registration, is perfectly clearly determined.

According to the bill "the registration of marriage is undertaken with the object of facilitating the protection of personal rights, the rights of property, and the interests of the parties to the marriage and the children." (Paragraph 1.) In a number of paragraphs it is pointed out that persons between whom a matrimonial relationship actually exists have the same rights as those whose marriage has been registered. The difference obviously exists that couples whose marriage is not registered must prove that they are living together in the marital relationship each time before the court or some other functionary of the government, whereas this is not the case for registered husbands and wives.

Either party to the marriage has still, as hitherto, the absolute right to divorce. In this respect, the bill simplifies the process of divorce in that it transfers it to the official registrar of births, marriages, and deaths, who is also intrusted with the registration of the marriage. In cases in which the divorce is undertaken at the instigation of one of the parties to the marriage, the mere notification of the completion of the divorce is substituted for the summonsing of both parties. In order to avoid the necessity of applying to the court or to the public notary to establish mutual understanding with regard to the consequences of the divorce in respect of the rights of possession and of the position of the children, the official registrar has been given the right to register the mutual agreement of the parties about these questions.

According to the existing law, marriage does not imply any community of ownership. In the construction of the proletarian state, this formula is inadequate. As matrimony is freed from any factor of compulsion, contracting marriage has no influence whatever on the independence of the parties as regards the right of possession. In this respect, understanding between the parties must be given the fullest scope possible. This idea is also expressed in Paragraph 10 of the bill, which gives the contracting parties the right to enter into any contract they like as regards their possessions, but under the condition that there should be no predetermined limitation of the rights of the woman or man, as this would not be legally binding.

Concerning property acquired by the couple in the course of their married life, the bill takes an exactly opposite point of view. Under the Soviet system, marriage represents in the first place a union of two workers, in which there is no possibility of dividing that which in this union is common property or of determining by whom it was earned and appropriated to the common use. It is therefore necessary from the standpoint of the law to recognize the equality of rights of each of the parties to the marriage to anything acquired by them in a period during which they lived together. Our legal practice established as early as in 1922 was that, even in cases where were e[illegible]rk of one of the partners, usually the woman, is limited [illegible] care of the family and the household, useful work has [illegible]rformed of no less value than that of the other partner question [illegible]t, in case of a divorce, the partner in question has the time [illegible] a full claim to receive his or her share. This corre[illegible] exactly with the customs and sense of justice of the [illegible]ry, as it is expressed in those paragraphs of the code [illegible]al with the land, when family property has to be divided. carri[illegible] is why in Paragraph 1 of the bill, community of ownership is provided for as regards all property resulting from living together.

In determining the judicial relations between children and parents, the bill maintains the fundamental features of the code of 1918. In the first place it emphasizes in full measure the significance of actual facts in determining the rights of the child in an unregistered marriage, as well as complete freedom of proof for establishing the facts. The same applies to the interests of the child, which must be the first consideration, always coming before the interests and wishes of the parents. The so-called parental rights are, according to the draft, by no means rights over the child, but rights in the name of the child, for the protection of the child. This principle is maintained in every paragraph dealing with parental rights.

The law at present in force does not recognize adoption. (Paragraph 183.) This is explained by the desire to avoid increasing the number of persons who, according to an earlier decree on the abolition of the right of inheritance, would have a claim to a portion of land for cultivation, by making adoption possible; further the wish to prevent minors being exploited under the pretext of adoption and finally by the intention of applying in full measure the possibility of communal education and guardianship.

At the present time, conditions have considerably changed. On the one hand, the work of the organization for the care and guardianship of children shows that every means which contributes to the welfare of children should be made use of, including that of placing them in families. On the other hand, a large number of people have quite conscientiously declared that they wish to take children into their families, a desire which there is no reason to oppose. Finally the custom is widespread among peasants of taking children into their family in a way that is almost identical with adoption. The bill therefore provides that the question of adoption shall be decided from case to case by the authorities responsible for guardianship, and that anyone who has the right to be a guardian shall also have the right to adopt.

At the same time, the bill puts a limit on the number of persons who have a claim to maintenance and on their part are obliged to give it, by restricting these rights and duties to parents and children only. The regulations in the previous code, according to which needy relatives in a direct and

On Being Close to It

There are 18,000 men in the United States who particularly are in touch with an economic change that comes sooner or later in every family.

They are the Prudential field men. They see the great good that life insurance does—daily examples of it. But they also see some instances in which there is no life insurance—no help left to dependents.

If every man could see what Prudential men see, every man with dependents would carry life insurance.

descending line and also own brothers and sisters have a claim to maintenance from their prosperous relations (Paragraph 172), are dropped out of this bill. . . .

Among the individual clauses of the last part of the bill, the new regulations for the procedure of registering marriage are especially noteworthy. The bill deprives, it is true, the contract of marriage of all ceremony but nevertheless establishes a definite and necessary procedure as a minimum; registration cannot be undertaken by any chance technical worker at the office, but must be performed by a responsible functionary; the deed of registration must be read to those present, and witnesses invited by the contracting parties may be admitted. . . .

The Columbus Hill Day Nursery

224 West 63rd Street New York

APPEALS FOR FUNDS

Ten thousand of New York's poorest Negroes live in the Columbus Hill district, and our Nursery is in their midst. Among this group are many mothers—some widowed, some deserted, some with sick or insane husbands—who must go out from their homes to work for others by the day in order to earn a living for themselves and their children. The Columbus Hill Day Nursery aims to help these mothers by providing care for their children during the working hours of the day.

A nominal fee is charged. In addition to this small income, the Nursery needs $6,000 a year for its maintenance and growth. Our Montessori class has had to be discontinued, because of lack of funds. Annual subscriptions are especially requested. Through your cooperation whole families will be helped to help themselves, thus saving them from dependency and their children from institutions.

Nation readers who believe in no race-line and realize the difficulty of maintaining an institution for colored children are urged to send what they can spare.

Stephen Hudson*

By EDWIN MUIR

IF one were asked what distinguishes Mr. Stephen Hudson's contribution to the literature of our age the reply might be that in his grasp of the motives of action he shows a more complete mastery and a greater sincerity than anyone else. The qualities in which he is peculiarly interested are those which will have a decisive effect on the destiny of a character: the qualities which betray Richard Kurt into his disastrous first marriage and the twenty years which follow it; the qualities which make Tony an adventurer and take him with incorrigible ease into scrapes and out of them, until at last he is tragically caught; the qualities which make Elinor's course so triumphant, so hateful, so sure, and so limited. Action is never separated in his novels, as it is in so many, from its results. At the moment of passion or of error his mind leaps forward to face the inevitable consequences; he apprehends immediately the change which a single action will impose upon future years; and it is this which makes his novels, with their bareness of outline, so dramatic. The simplest incidents he records are significant, for they carry on their surface the whole weight of a future. And as the actions of his characters imply the destiny which they are working out, so they presuppose all the qualities which have gone to produce them: the ruling passions which have in the past been expressed in actions of a like nature and thus have formed and consolidated a character, good or bad, weak or strong. Cause and effect are inescapable; every action, every impulse, has its relation; and it is Mr. Hudson's distinction to have apprehended this more completely and faced it more courageously than any other writer of our time. He has seen intensely this truth of necessity, psychological law, destiny, call it what we may; and, holding it, he has given to the characters he describes and the events he records a rare unconditionality, so that we feel they could be nothing but what they are, and that qualities no less than events are inexorable.

This sense of necessity, of cause and effect, is at the center of Mr. Hudson's vision of life, and so he has rejected more and more everything which is irrelevant to it. Accordingly the people he portrays are not so much characters as essences of characters. When he describes Elinor and Tony he sets down nothing but the typical, nothing but those idiosyncrasies and acts which reveal the essential ego. He does this completely. Tony is self-subsistent not only in his ruling passions but in his philosophy, which is an adumbration of these, and as inexorably necessitated. His character is consequently irrevocable, an organism operating by its own laws, which neither our love nor our importunity nor our opposition can essentially change. At the center of Elinor, in the same way, is a perfectly naive egotism; but it is reinforced through the personality which by an inscrutable process it builds round itself to be its expression and its defense; so that even Elinor's thoughts are a part of her egotism, and she is incapable of thinking against herself. Where other writers convince us of the reality of their imaginary world by the employment of light and shade, by making their characters act in apparent contradiction to themselves, but in a way to bring us back once more to themselves, Mr. Hudson convinces us by showing us in their passions, their actions, and their thoughts the same motive power. Thus every expression, however noble, of a character of his will be determined by the limitations of that character. Even the virtues, to which people not necessarily sentimental sometimes attribute an infinite effectuality, are in his novels effectual only to an extent determined by the moral complexion of the people who exercise them. So when Tony is actuated by affection for Richard his measures are of no avail for the decisive reason that the natures and the needs of the two brothers are different. He so purely acts out of himself and of all he has been that there is more of himself than of virtue in his virtues. All Mr. Hudson's characters are like Tony in this. The gallery of characters in "Myrtle" speak straight out of themselves, and their utterance is limited by a complete, unconscious, self-subsisting attitude to the world. The paucity of external characterization only makes the inner characterization more definite. Here as elsewhere Mr. Hudson's imagination is occupied severely with essentials.

And for Mr. Hudson the essential things are the motives, the passions whose results, happy or disastrous, have an abiding effect. He writes about passions and sentiments only when they are motives, or in so far as they are motives. Of the passions in themselves in their richness and diversity he has little to tell us, and although he does not avoid them he indicates them briefly. He is so concentrated on their effects, on what they will bring rather than on what at the moment they present, that he selects from among their manifestations only those (and they are of course the essential ones) which will influence a whole tract of life, both essentially and externally. It is this that gives his novels their extraordinary economy and justifies that economy. It is this that enables him to produce in "Elinor Colhouse" an atmosphere of overhanging disaster, so that we feel in reading the book the shadow of the twenty years of suffering of which the incident it describes was to be the cause; for it is the lack of detailed attention to the passion itself, the nakedness with which the motives are revealed, that by such simple means achieves this intensity. Everything in these novels is oriented toward something which has not yet emerged, and has the atmosphere as much of a prelude as of a statement. Life is not moving, as we normally see it, toward no end that we can foretell; it is moving rather toward a point which is the point of reference of Mr. Hudson's imagination, and is outside and beyond the part of experience he is treating.

But if the feeling of consequences of the certainties of the future, is by these indirect means given so strongly in Mr. Hudson's novels, the sense of the past, of causes, is given no less strongly and by means as indirect. In "Prince Hempseed" he began to exploit the resources of the first person singular in narrative, and in "Tony" and "Myrtle" he developed them. The beauty of the first person singular is that, when it is used as it should be, it implies at every moment, transpiring through the simplest statements, a whole background, a whole life; and it does this the more perfectly the more apparently unpremeditated the narrative, the less the narrator's eye is fixed on one particular episode, the less obviously interesting, even, the events are in themselves. For when the events are so interesting in themselves that they occupy the center of our attention the background—all the narrator has felt or seen—falls away; he becomes mere function, a narrator and nothing more, and his personality, his very existence, becomes in a sense irrelevant, for deprived of them he is a more per- means for his immediate purpose. He has no existence pt as the recorder of or the participator in the action lescribes, and it is by courtesy of it that he exists, and not of his own right. He has no past to throw its associations over the event, and therefore no personality, for personality can be rendered only in its growth or in its constancy, to show either of which a direct or indirect reference back is necessary. But having none of these things this questionable character has no serious artistic justification. When, to take a notorious example, Stevenson used the first person singular in "Treasure Island," it was merely to make us believe more readily in the story by substituting for himself a respectable writer living at the end of Victoria's reign, a boy who was on the spot and in the period. Tricks such as these are puerile, and if the reader accepts them as part of a game of make-believe between himself and the writer he has to accept along with them a certain meaninglessness and triviality of enjoyment. But this is only one of the various false ways of exploiting the first person. The ordinary autobiographical novelist exploits it generally for its looseness, and to unburden his views on life upon us rather than upon that life itself. Mr. Hudson commits none of these errors. The form once chosen, he is almost unerring in h's use of it. The personal monologue in which "Prince Hempseed," "Tony," and "Myrtle" are written hardly ever falls into the set narrative piece which so readily arouses our suspicions; the events flow on, some of them apparently trivial, some obviously important; and the reasons why they are memorable, implicit in the emphasis with which they are set down, are never explicitly or baldly stated. This monologue is neither mere narrative nor a mere outpouring of memories bound together by threads of association. It is rather a form in which the utterance of the soliloquist is heightened, his uncritical memory clarified and crystallized, his everyday personality replaced by the more essential personality which self-knowledge reveals. This newly awakened personality it is which tells us of the other personality which existed before as its shadow, seeing where it acted rightly and where wrongly, and why. It gives distance to the presentation, for looking back at what it once seemed to be it is, as it were, contemplating a different character. The existence of this second more essential personality is the complete artistic justification of Mr. Hudson's use of the first person; for through it experience is not merely repeated, as it is in the generality of autobiographical novels; it is assayed.

*This is the sixth of a series of articles by Mr. Muir dealing with those younger authors of today who are on the process of becoming established. Essays have appeared on D. H. Lawrence, Edith Sitwell, Lytton Strachey, T. S. Eliot, and James Joyce.

But if the assaying of experience is the chief function performed by the monologue as Mr. Hudson uses it, it has many other advantages. By means of it he provides that background to experience without which there can be no genuine art, and provides it indirectly, as the background in a work of art should be provided, to color but not obscure or retard the action. Using it, he secures his effects by the simplest means. When, for instance, one of his monologists says in "Myrtle," "They were all going down to the sea-side that August," there is a strange beauty of implied association in the banal statement; we are led to add to it the necromancy of several memories. For those who can apprehend them Mr. Hudson's work is full of effects such as these. It is a characteristic of his art that in an apparently banal scene he can give us something which if it is not poetry opens a window on poetry. He does this not through any art of suggestion but by being so exact and clear that our imagination seizes the scene as if it were a concrete and inexplicable object, and is impelled to act upon it as it acts on reality.

This condensed, eliminative, almost taciturn art has its limitations; but a limitation in a work is only bad when it is arbitrary, and is necessitated by nothing in the character of the positive vision. Mr. Hudson's limitations are definite, but they are necessitated by his vision and his artistic purpose. They arise from the fact that being concerned with essentials, stating nakedly the motives of his characters, he has to a great extent to ignore that rich variety of manifestation which the motives create to be their disguise as much as their expression. Certain writers, perhaps the majority, have concerned themselves in detail with the disguises of the motives; have shown them tragically as illusion and in comedy as inconsistency, cant, deceit; but Mr. Hudson is so impatient of them that he takes us immediately to what underlies them, the particular object which by their means the ego wishes to secure. This limits his field of experience, but the limitation is organic, it is a concentration; so that even when the chief human passions are not exhaustively described they are as actually present in our minds as if they were. We feel them all the more strongly, perhaps, because they are assumed; for assumptions are more incontestable than statements; and the true value of economy in art is that, avoiding detailed description, it can convey intensely, and thus make it impossible for us to escape from, a solid mass of assumption. Mr. Hudson's work belongs to this rare and economical order; it has clarity, but it has also depth; and although, in the nature of things, it cannot yet be definitely judged, its high qualities are more incontestable than those of any other novelist of our time.

Can an Artist Live in America?*

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

THIS is an interesting and entirely valueless question. It is not only interesting but very pleasant, because it is so easy to prove with equal completeness that an artist can, can not, should, should not, must, must not, live in America, Czecho-Slovakia, Paris, Oxford, or any other place whatever.

One slight difficulty in being very eloquent on the subject is the confusion as to what is indicated by artist, live, and America. What does "artist" mean? Does it include writers? Or is it confined to cartoonists, tea-room proprietors, and fat tenors? And what is an artistic writer?

What is "living in America"? Does a person who spends only three months out of the year in the United States, but that three months very keenly and eagerly, and then goes abroad to digest those impressions—does he really live in America or in Europe?

* This is the seventh of a series of articles by American writers of the first rank, answering in the light of their personal experience the question: Can a literary artist function freely in the United States? Articles by Willa Cather and Floyd Dell will follow. Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, Edgar Lee Masters, and Ludwig Lewisohn have hitherto contributed.

And to which America does the question refer? Obviously the more sacrosanct parts of Boston are infinitely more like London than they are like North Dakota, Mississippi, or Pittsburgh.

But anyway I shall prove that an artist can live in America by this random list of writers who remain in the United States all the time or nearly all the time: Hergesheimer, Cabell, Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, O'Neill, Van Vechten, Elinor Wylie, Sherwood Anderson, Dreiser, Tarkington, Katharine Gerould, Robert Frost, Edward Arlington Robinson, William Ellery Leonard, Zona Gale, Louis Bromfield, Montague Glass, Thyra Winslow, Ring Lardner, George Ade, Edgar Lee Masters.

This list proves, not by fantastic theorizing as to whether they can remain here but by the fact that they do remain here—it proves that distinguished artists not only stay in America but delight to do so, and that——

It does not! It doesn't prove anything whatever!

Suppose some one gave Joseph Hergesheimer a Tudor manor house in Devon, with the rights of the lord of the manor, membership in the Garrick and Athenaeum clubs, and twenty thousand pounds a year, on condition that he spend not more than six weeks a year in America. Suppose Mrs. Gerould were offered the editorship of the London Spectator, with a noble salary and a guaranty that she should have three days a week free for her private writing.

Suppose Schnitzler wrote to Van Vechten that he had just bought an imperial castle in the Tyrol, and would Carl please come and stay a year or two? Just how long would Hergesheimer, Mrs. Gerould, and Van Vechten remain here to prove whatever they do prove?

I dare the Spectator and Schnitzler to make these offers and find out; and as for Hergesheimer, I invite all the literary millionaires in England to give him not one but sixteen manor houses, lovely ones, with rose gardens, all over England.

By another still more random list I shall now prove that an artist can not and should not remain in America. These are people who have spent most or all of recent years abroad:

This is an especially good list, because by it you can prove not only that the really original and vital creative writer must remain abroad but also that some of the American writers who remain abroad are absolute duds. And best of all, it doesn't really prove either, because Edith Wharton would have written in approximately the same manner on North Washington Square as she now does in Hyères; and Ludwig Lewisohn when I met him in Vienna seemed to me exactly like Ludwig in New York.

And Henry James (his name must, whatever else you say, enter any discussion of this matter)—Henry James in a proper Back Bay residence, with a month annually in Bar Harbor, would have woven about himself precisely the same unreal environment as he wove in London—in his London—that mirage London composed of viscountesses, the maiden aunts of vicars, and the second cousins of Cambridge dons; a London devoid of cigar salesmen, mail carriers, Wesleyan M.P.'s, and socialistic journalists.

Then there are the people who go abroad frequently but never stay long—such writers as Mencken, Nathan, Marc Connolly, Donald Ogden Stewart, Wilbur Daniel Steele, Fannie Hurst, Edna Ferber, Willa Cather, Dorothy Canfield, Hendrik van Loon, Laurence Stallings, Mary Heaton Vorse, Tom and Peggy Boyd, Allan Updegraff.

What this list proves, I do not know. The reason I don't know is that I can't decide on which horn of this controversy I am. If I did know, I'd very soon find out and most reasonably explain it.

If in this contribution to a query which is so greatly to affect the poor little shrinking naked souls of our creative artists I seem to be flippant, I can only explain indignantly that I am trying to be flippant. The question seems to me fully as important as a Tennessee judge's opinion of biology, and as stirring as that debate of our childhood: "Should the boy go to a large college or a small one?"

Nobody ever had the nerve to rise, remark "It depends on the boy and it depends on the college and it doesn't make much difference anyway," and then firmly sit down.

It is fortunate that no one ever did that, because it would have been flippant, it would have been lacking in the earnestness which should always robe such debates, and it would have killed the topic forever.

Stay home? Why certainly—if you can afford to, if you like to, and if you can find a reliable bootlegger.

Stay abroad? Certainly—if you can make a living there, if you can raise the fare, and if you can get along without corn on cob.

Do what you want to . . . if you can!

Death of Little Boys

By ALLEN TATE

When little boys grown patient at last, weary,
Surrender their eyes immeasurably to the night,
The event will rage terrific as the sea;
Their bodies fill a crumbling room with light. . . .

Then you will touch at the bedside, torn in two,
Gold curls now deftly intricate with gray
As the windowpane extends a fear to you
From one peeled aster drenched with the wind all day.

And over his chest the covers, in an ultimate dream,
Will mount to the teeth, ascend the eyes, press back
The locks—while round his sturdy belly gleam
The suspended breaths, white spars above his wreck:

Till all the guests, come in to look, turn down
Their palms; and delirium assails the cliff
Of Bedlam where you ponder, and your quiet town
Reels like a sailor drunk in a rotten skiff. . . .

The bleak sunshine shrieks its chipped music then
Out to the milkweed amid the fields of wheat.
There is a calm for you in the street where men
Unroll the chill precision of moving feet.

The Friend

By FRANK ERNEST HILL

You asked of this one and of that
About him; I, who did not ask,
Adventurously with him sat,
Watching him word by word unmask.

One fed you pale uncertainty
Of family, of clothes, of morals;
Another breathed suspicion he
Had struck the spark for certain quarrels.

But I who walked beside him knew
In speech and act the flags of blood;
We shared in moods almost as two
Who eat together of one food.

Mind touching mind, heart meeting heart,
I have found treasure in this man;
Now you who feared to risk must start,
If you will start, where I began.

First Glance

"The Life and Letters of John Burroughs," by Clara Barrus (Houghton Mifflin, 2 vols.: $12.50), is the longest book that will ever be written upon its subject, and the fact that it tells everything is only one of the reasons for this. Another reason is that Dr. Barrus, whether or not she knows it, has demonstrated very clearly that there are limits to the capacity of Burroughs to be interesting. Without going out of her way—for nothing was out of her way—she has marked those limits with a fatal exactitude; so that in the present work we know we have all that we want of Burroughs and a great deal more. What we want of him is certainly not unimportant, and Dr. Barrus gives us that part more clearly than it has ever been given. The rest is official biography.

The interest Burroughs was in his youth, just as his best books are the earliest. The story of this youth as Dr. Barrus tells it is both convincing and interesting—particularly after Walt Whitman comes upon the scene. For in even a greater degree than Emerson made Whitman—and that degree is greater than is commonly recognized—Whitman made Burroughs. Emerson, too, was a powerful influence upon the young school-teacher and government clerk, as he was upon every impressionable mind in his day; but Burroughs had moments later on when he could doubt Emerson, whereas he never ceased to worship the "half thrush, half alligator" whom Emerson had always a few misgivings about. He went to Washington at twenty-six with a promising but a raw-boned mind; he came away at thirty-five, having written two books and having twenty-five more to write, with that mind already possessed of whatever form and warmth it was eventually to reveal. In his old age he claimed to have had at best "a humdrum life, with a few honest books to its credit." The humdrum parts were before and after Whitman; the few good books—all were honest—were those, I think, which Burroughs wrote during the early and middle periods of his career when under the shining sun of Whitman his ideas and emotions ran perfectly together. The tale of the two men at Washington would make a valuable book in itself, telling as it would how they met and walked and talked; how Burroughs wrote excitedly to his uncomprehending wife and to all his friends about this incredible creature whom he could not keep out of his thoughts; how he furnished the gray-brown bird for "When Lilacs Last in the Door-Yard Bloom'd"; how he wrote at least half of a book in celebration of Whitman, and how Whitman wrote the other half; and how he entered in his notebook the following unsurpassable sketch of his friend's face:

> Notwithstanding the beauty and expressiveness of his eyes, I occasionally see something in them as he bends them upon me that almost makes me draw back. I cannot explain it—whether it is more, or less, than human. It is as if the earth looked at me—dumb, yearning, relentless, immodest, unhuman. If the impersonal elements and forces were concentrated in an eye, that would be it. It is not piercing, but absorbing and devouring—the pupil expanded, the lid slightly drooping, and the eye set and fixed.

Perhaps it is as this sort of critic that Burroughs shows to the best advantage in Dr. Barrus's book. There is another passage on the aging Emerson's "irrelevant and pitiful" lectures, and there are not a few illuminating remarks upon Thoreau. Burroughs within his limits was an excellent critic, as within his limits he was one of the purest of writers about nature. Outside his limits he was often dull or absurd; and most of the second volume here, made up as it is largely from the later Journal, will be worth while to none but worshipers. Fortunately for the biographer there seem to be thousands of those.

MARK VAN DOREN

Mr. Mencken Triumphant

Americana 1925. Edited by H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50. Prejudices: Fourth Series. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50. Gulliver's Travels. By Jonathan Swift. With an introduction by H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $4. The Man Mencken. By Isaac Goldberg. Simon and Schuster. $4. H. L. Mencken. By Ernest Boyd. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.

THESE five books mark another turning-point in Mr. Mencken's career. Far behind him are the days when he was the half-fabulous Antichrist of Baltimore whose name, it is said, was used by exasperated mothers to cow naughty children; when he was the editor and literary critic of an obscure and dubious magazine and was reputed to be waging a continuous warfare against all that was decent and of good report in American literature, morals, and scholarship. He is no longer regarded, in literate society, as a paid—or even as a self-appointed—agent of the Wilhelmstrasse. Professorial book reviewers do not find it as remunerative and as safe as of yore to assault him with sarcasm, innuendo, and academic billingsgate. That game, too, is played out. After weathering years of neglect, of abuse, and finally of indiscriminate praise, Mr. Mencken has at last emerged from the ruck of contemporary journalism and literature as a writer of unmistakable distinction and importance.

He is a difficult subject for the critic. To begin with, he either powerfully attracts or violently repels. The range, moreover, of his interests and activities is such that no complete view of him can be achieved within the limits of the usual review. Besides being an active journalist and magazine editor, Mr. Mencken is a literary critic of great influence and a writer on a dozen or more different subjects—literary history, aesthetics, language, music, medicine, theology, military strategy, social psychology, government, philosophy, morals, law, and feminism. On every subject he touches he has something provocative to say. But the critic must not only grapple with a man whose interests are almost as varied as American life itself and whose ideas and opinions march in impudent processions across his pages; he has also to reckon with a comic poet and satirist whose unfailing verve, velocity, and comic force, fed by his immense knowledge of life and his torrential wealth of language, make him the peer of such satiric philosophers as Lucian, Rabelais, Swift, Voltaire, and Heine. It is little wonder that criticism finds it hard to treat him adequately. Such critics as Newton Arvin, Vincent O'Sullivan, Burton Rascoe, Carl Van Doren, and Edmund Wilson have written of him with understanding and sympathy. Now Mr. Boyd and Mr. Goldberg come forward with studies of greater scope and usefulness.

Mr. Boyd's volume—the fourth in the Modern American Writers Series—is a compact, lucid, well-informed exposition, often in the subject's own words, of the man, the philosopher, and the critic. As criticism it reveals neatly both the strength and the weakness of Mr. Mencken's doctrines. If to some readers its elaborate demonstration that Mr. Mencken is an American seems about as necessary as detailed proofs that Paul von Hindenburg is a German, to other readers the fact may perhaps be news. By skilful use, however, of example and quotation Mr. Boyd shows that Mr. Mencken's allegedly poisonous and subversive ideas are simply the ideas of Jefferson, Emerson, Thoreau, Lincoln, Whitman, and other men whose portraits hang on the walls of our public and college libraries and whose writings—to our loss—remain undisturbed on the shelves.

Mr. Goldberg's biographical study is entirely different in plan and scale. The author has worked with a scholar's love for facts and an artist's eye for their composition. Though the book runs to nearly 400 pages it is interesting from end to end, and—barring a few paragraphs of facetiousness and a few that approach the ecstatic—it is an excellent performance. Mr. Mencken's ancestry and his formative period are presented with an abundance of exact and vivid detail. The book is, indeed, crammed and stuffed with interesting, significant, amusing, charming facts. Many are, of course, extracted from Mr. Mencken's numerous autobiographical passages, which Mr. Goldberg has evidently collected with loving care and subjected to an intelligent critical scrutiny; but many more the biographer dug up for himself. Mr. Mencken's newspaper and magazine career is likewise followed in detail, and all his important work receives a conscientious appraisal that also considers the judgments of previous critics. Mr. Mencken is frequently the speaker, as in Mr. Boyd's essay, and an appendix of eighty pages reprints specimens of his early verse, short-stories, and fables. One of the most curious things in the book is the story of how Theodore Dreiser procured Mr. Mencken's appointment in 1908 as literary critic of the Smart Set. When Mr. Mencken published his Smart Set valedictory in December, 1923, he was unaware of Dreiser's part in the affair.

The illustrations add life to the text: portraits of distinguished forebears—Dr. Otto Mencken, Dr. Johann Burchard Mencken, who in 1715 published a small volume of "Declamationes de Charlataneria Eruditorum," Dr. Lüder Mencken; a chart of the variations in the Mencken coat-of-arms; interior and exterior views of the family mansion in Baltimore; two boyish pencil sketches; "an unnamed Salon Piece composed about 1900"; a picture of the old saloon behind the Baltimore Sun office; a facsimile of some specimens of the Free Lance column; and—of course—numerous photographs of the hero from the age of six months to forty-five. The McKee Barclay cartoon of the "subconscious Mencken" is also included—a caricature more revelatory than any photograph. It is a fascinating, kaleidoscopic book, in the making of which scholarship collaborated with gusto.

The gradual change in Mr. Mencken's chief interests, the significance of which he himself has pointed out, is clearly visible in "Prejudices: Fourth Series." Ideas are now his principal theme; specific men and books are in the background. Like its predecessors, the fourth "Prejudices" is a miscellany of matter salvaged from the periodicals, and, taken as a whole, it is quite the best of the series. It contains less padding than any of the others and a larger proportion of excellent work. The macabre vision of the life and destiny of New York City and the grotesque hyperbole and wild eloquence masking the fundamental seriousness of The Husbandman are in the Menckenian grand manner; the essays on the American Tradition and on the American Novel are also noteworthy. The introduction to "Gulliver's Travels," the two-hundredth anniversary of whose publication falls next year, is brief but characteristic.

"Americana 1925" is a chapter in that colossal "Geschichte der Menschlichen Dummheit" which Carlyle's terrible humor once conceived. None of Mr. Mencken's books—not even the "American Language"—has more of Mr. Mencken's peculiar quality. The zealous scholar, the relentless satirist, the gargantuan humorist, the lyrical prophet are all at work. The book will doubtless be read chiefly for its humor, for it is excruciatingly funny; but Mr. Mencken himself regards it in his preface as a source-book for the study of American life—and as such, too, one can hardly read it without recognizing its authenticity. But although it is both humor and sociology, it is something more. On the technical side it is simply an enormous expansion of the poetic prose paragraphs into which Mr. Mencken has poured so much of his characteristic thought and imagery. There are in it the same cataloguing style, the same love of proper names, the same lyrical fervor. It is the work of an inverted poet, inspired not by the contemplation of beauty and truth but by the contemplation of squalor and folly. Rising to the height of his great theme, the connoisseur of human depravity becomes for the moment a visionary poet and prophet.

In his vision the familiar America of other men becomes a vast, mysterious continent, as strange and perilous to civilized men as the remote reaches of Tibet or Siberia. The swarming population, as incomprehensible as the fabulous peoples in books of imaginary voyages, is perpetually engaged in all manner of incredible barbarities, follies, stupidities, cruelties, blasphemies—an unending spectacle of a life as terrible as it is futile. Individually each incident is trivial or even ludicrous; in the aggregate they become a gigantic panorama, at once lurid and somber, of the pride, stupidity, and folly of mankind. The public will probably take it for a piece of journalistic smart-alecry; but it is the work of a profound imagination, looking with amusement and dismay upon the vanity of all life.

GEORGE GENZMER

Father and Son

The History of the Standard Oil Company. By Ida M. Tarbell. The Macmillan Company. New edition. Two volumes. $7.50

Employees' Representation in Steel Works. By Ben M. Selekman. Russell Sage Foundation.

Employees' Representation in Coal Mines. By Ben M. Selekman and Mary Van Kleeck. Russell Sage Foundation.

NOW it can be told even better than it could twenty-five years ago. The Standard Oil Company, under the elder Rockefeller, represented "a living purpose," administratively almost perfect and morally absolutely impervious.

These two volumes are still the master-work of American muckraking. Miss Tarbell's research, unlike Upton Sinclair's recent performances, is as hole-proof as it is fool-proof, and accordingly she does not passionately throw mud but evenly sprays it on her victim. I understand that in her third volume, announced for next year, she means to whitewash the ogre. If so, she must have infinite patience, for it will take innumerable coats.

But the very perfection of Miss Tarbell's indictment shows the weakness of muckraking as an instrument of lasting censure. The villain escaped her. She does her best to show that Mr. Rockefeller is beyond good and evil, yet she asks one to despise him on moral grounds. She brings out his almost insanely courageous knowledge of what he wanted, and then implies that he is a bit of a coward because he lied (as attested in black and white) before two investigating committees. He is "a dreamer," she says, really a lyrical poet in industrial empire building; then she subpoenas him for infringing the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. It cannot be done that way. All Miss Tarbell really shows is that Mr. Rockefeller was the greatest privateer in the history of American capitalism, compared to whom the most gifted buccaneers, from Gould I to Morgan II, were mere amateurs.

Of course Miss Tarbell proves her specific contentions up to the hilt of her paper knife. She proves incontrovertibly, unlibelously, ultra-logically—by congressional, statistical, legal, academic, journalistic, telegraphic, epistolary, and other mutually attestative appendices and documentations—that the Standard was built, aside from legitimate efficiency, by criminal conspiracy and incredible ruthlessness, and with that uncanny shrewdness which makes moral idiocy sinister. She proved it all so well that the only way the omnipotent Standard could meet her first attack was by buying it out of circulation to the great delight of the booksellers.

She shows how Mr. Rockefeller first cornered his home market in Cleveland; how he illegally annoyed, overtly browbeat, and secretly knifed the other refiners. She proves again and again how he "contrived" to obtain illegal rebates from the railroads, finally getting a "rake-off" even on his competitors' shipments. He maneuvered favorable "drawbacks," he created fictitious "companies," he manipulated dummy directors with a phenomenal insight into the perverse shifts of competitive anarchy.

He undercut, he outbargained, he was a consummate borrower. He extracted the last drop of oil from the daily sweepings of his refineries; he saved the oil which others let run into the ground; he sold all the junk. He made his own barrels; and when the barrels rolled out of the industry he built his own straight pipe lines. He dismantled every bit of idle investment as quickly as he improved every bit of working machinery. Long before the day of the Chamber of Commerce he had a research and publicity bureau which really studied the international oil supply and pushed the international market. He unerringly picked the right men. He "watched and saved and contrived" and connived, and prevaricated about his business when he was forced to speak of it at all. And when the Standard Oil trust was finally "broken up" he simply divided his 256,854 shares into so many stock certificates in the twenty daughter companies—and turned over "the assignment of certificate, a properly framed and numbered document . . . to the liquidating trustees."

All this Miss Tarbell proves to the satisfaction of the most meticulous Ph.D. But as a muckraker she commits a fatal error when she quasi-illustrates her evidence with photographs of Mr. Rockefeller. A square, small, thin mask—with features at once fugitive and incisive, which give the face a profound secretiveness. A mere stencil-cut of a mouth. A sharp little tilted nose, with nostrils which seem to sniff eagerly and nervously even in print. A hard, jesuitical chinlet which retreats into the collar and belies the silly notion that "strong" faces must sport heavy jaws. The main thing are the eyes; wide apart, small, absolutely calm, half-hidden under onion-skin lids, of a dull gray, they are turned up and in with a cold, fanatic, pitiless stare, without a trace of humor or doubt or charm. No. This man was never dishonest with himself. He did what he did because he could do no otherwise. He expressed the genius of the jungle period in modern industrialism. And he did it with the emotional ultimateness of the tiger. Fake was never in him. His Baptist God was so simple-minded because he could rely on himself. Even his philanthropies, which are usually the last refuge of fakers, are genuine. The Rockefeller Foundation, which is entirely his idea, is at the unstipulated service of every race. And, most likely, his compulsion neurosis of presenting shining dimes to honest-faced caddies and cops is based on the real belief that he made his billion in much the same homely fashion. Possibly some future and fairer historian may find that his works represented an era of necessary evil.

Just as the Standard Oil Company is the child of the elder Rockefeller so the Rockefeller Plan of company unionism is the child of the younger Rockefeller. The main purpose of the plan is to provide an "efficient method whereby the petty frictions of daily work might be dealt with promptly and justly." These "petty frictions," Mr. Rockefeller adds, are at the basis of our industrial maladjustment. The plan grew out of Mr. Rockefeller's genuine disturbance over the Ludlow massacre of men, women, and children in his Colorado coal properties in 1913. It is a very typical "employees'-representation" scheme, which he calls a "republic of labor," with all the paraphernalia of company-union franchise and "democracy."

The plan of the younger Rockefeller also found a contemporary analyst in Mr. Selekman of the Russell Sage Foundation. His two volumes (in one of which Miss Van Kleeck collaborated with him) are models of descriptive research. The foundation, of course, never muckrakes. Indeed it refrains from passing even a posteriori judgments, no matter how legitimately they may follow from material gathered in safe and sane belatedness. As it sits on the economic fence it leans backward with the somewhat officious anxiety of professional social research. With a fine show of fairness, which curiously savors of timidity, the foundation showed Mr. Rockefeller Mr. Selekman's excellent studies, which suggested by mere objective statement that the plan is not much of a plan; that were the foundation less fastidious in its objectivity it might, indeed, have called it a frost. Mr. Selekman ventures to point out that the men in the Minnequa Steel Works have no choice whatever when choosing really matters; that they got the eight-hour day only after, and avowedly due to the fact that, the United States Steel Corporation had introduced the basic eight-hour day—which it did to counteract the threatening steel strike of 1919. Mr. Selekman also begs to state that wages in the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company are entirely guided by the union market. Mr. Rockefeller's miners struck with their organized comrades in the coal strikes of 1919 and 1922. His steel workers ungraciously struck in the great steel strike of 1919. It seems that they do not care whether or not Mr. Rockefeller dances with their wives on his occasional visits to Colorado. But they distinctly do not care for their enforced naturalization in his "republic of labor." The Rockefeller Plan, in short, is pure bunk! And the bunk of it was born when Mr. Rockefeller, Jr.'s, industrial innocence was conjoined with the intellectual dishonesty of the professional trimmers who worked out and helped to instal it.

Such are father and son. The sins of the father's peculiar genius did not fail to revenge themselves on the son. In the throne room at 26 Broadway sits a well-meaning, youngish-middle-aged man who inherited none of the gifts that built his fantastic power, with its vast responsibilities—both of which things confuse him miserably in an ever more complex and critical order. The father was an expert at alibis, framed by a gang of hardy and, in a way, admirable pirates—Flagler, Rogers, Archbold, O'Day. The son is a victim of apologies, framed by publicity "experts" and by a motley of industrial courtiers whose motives are far more personal and intricate than his. It is in this meretricious atmosphere of converting old evils into new shams that Mr. Rockefeller, Jr., conceived his naive "republic of labor." There is no doubt that he believes in it. "Apologia pro vita patris sui?"

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Thomas Mann at Fifty

Der Zauberberg. Von Thomas Mann. Zwei Bände. Berlin: S. Fischer.

Thomas Mann. Sein Leben und sein Werk. Von Arthur Eloesser. Berlin: S. Fischer.

THE reputation of Thomas Mann has been a matter neither of facile productivity nor of striking variety or novelty of theme, nor of the constant presence of his name in the press, nor of any of the loud and tawdry and slightly unscrupulous actions and circumstances that often make a contemporary world mistake the clamor of notoriety for the slow voice of fame. Isolated, austere, seeking through the art that was given him to render an accounting of himself and his world, believing with Goethe that invention is a vain thing, that the concrete, if it be but perfectly represented, implies symbolically yet really the entire peopled universe, this noble writer has neither cried nor striven nor made haste. "Buddenbrooks" is nearly a quarter of a century old; the two volumes of the consummately done tales and novelettes have been before the public for a good many years; the essays of the war period, "Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen" and "Rede und Antwort," did not, after all, carry on the main line of his creative activity. Now, just before his fiftieth birthday, he publishes the result of seven years of slow, ardent, vigilant labor, "Der Zauberberg." The novel is in two thick volumes. It is nearly twelve hundred pages long. It makes no concessions. Thomas Mann is not a man of concessions. Yet, as Dr. Eloesser rightly remarks, it has made the German people, in spite of sport and the movies and the demoralization of these latter years, learn to read once more. This voice was not to be denied—this voice that speaks not out of vanity, not even out of the nobler vanity of the artist, nor yet with any prophetic arrogance, but with an incomparable union of sobriety and depth concerning the fate and life and death of man. "Who is a master in truth?" Dr. Eloesser asks near the end of his eloquent and searching study. "He who helps us to live. And who can help us? Not the man of some party, the man of ready-made reasons and a ready answer, but the self-questioner, the deeply tempted, the deeply shaken who seeks ultimate reason beyond the reasons of men." The great stylist, too, the biographer goes on to explain, who seeks the beauty of the word not that it may charm and glitter, but that it may the more perfectly speak—the man of high talent who sees in perfection of execution the character that he owes this talent, without which that talent would be cheap and vain.

For the definite celebration of his fiftieth birthday this June Thomas Mann was invited to Vienna. He lectured on "Goethe and Tolstoi"; he spoke at the dinner of the P. E. N. club on the mystery of form; he bore out in all his words and his bearing the characterization with which Raoul Auernheimer greeted him, that of the "most responsible" of living artists. He has not the ruddy glow of Wassermann, smoldering so often with that "last infirmity of noble minds," nor the restless mobility of Schnitzler, nor the careful reserve, as careful as his frock-coat, of Galsworthy. He is not much moved by fame nor afraid of age and death and has long sunk the patrician in the man. He might easily be mistaken for a North German or American man of business of a quiet and refined type with his narrow, dark head with hair conventionally parted on the left, clipped but not too close-clipped black mustache. Yet in his simple appearance and demeanor there is never a moment's stressing of the note of simplicity. He is neither eager for praise nor impatient of it, nor unkindly toward the adulation of fools, but thoughtful, measured, calm, smoking his cigar, exchanging the necessary commonplaces of the dinner-table without eagerness but without condescension. A supremely kind and earnest man, utterly untempted to make either kindness or earnestness or stylistic stringency the "notes" of his personality. A man "all wool," as incapable of handing out shoddy in the high matters of his trade as his merchant ancestors in Lübeck were of measuring with false measures.

In "Buddenbrooks" and in "Tonio Kroeger" and elsewhere Thomas Mann sought to give a responsible accounting of himself and so of the creative artist in human society. In "Der Zauberberg" he turns to human society itself—to the European world on the edge of the great war but unconscious of it—and lets that society, under his philosophic and emotional guidance, render an accounting of itself. He accomplishes his purpose not by telling many stories of many men nor by dealing in incident or even primarily in character. In a sanatorium near Davos, in a high, isolated world, where nature abandons the very march of the accustomed seasons and time, grown relative in actual fact, stands icily still, Thomas Mann has staged the great debate of all the psychical forces that govern man, the great research concerning our knowledge and our ignorance of our fate, the great speculation concerning the health and the disease of mind and body, the nature of both and their relation, the high and ultimate secrets of love and death. His protagonists are men and voices, too: Stembrini, the humanist, bourgeois liberal, rhetor, who with all his fine truths and fine sentiments concerning the dignity and liberty of man cannot save for man either that dignity or that liberty; Naphta, the apostate Jew turned Jesuit, who strangely yet logically enough symbolizes the reactions toward power and obedience, so-called discipline and so-called order, that unite the hierarch and the proletarian, the Fascist and the Communist; Behrens, the physician, the scientist pure and simple, quite honest in intent yet forced, by the inevitable gaps in our knowledge, into a measure of charlatanism. And all these voices, as well as the morbid siren song of Clawdia Chauchat and the indomitable vitality of the self-sufficing force of Mynheer Peperkorn, hurtle about the head of that once simple young man and titular hero, Hans Castorp, engineer of Hamburg. Once simple and straightforward and almost unreflective but now cast, with his abnormal temperature and acuter sensitiveness, into the midst of this severe and rarefied world wherein all emotions are more direct and terrible and all ideas more trenchant and ultimate and in which the confusion of time, no longer cut and divided by business or pleasure, invites to an hourly facing of last and absolute issues. And Hans Castorp, held by this spiritualization of his inner self, held by the timelessness of time, held, too, by the fatal siren voice of the Russian temptress, clings to these strange heights of snow and pine and eternity. But the great, foul, blasting thunder that cleft through the midst of the world blasts him loose from his speculative eminence and hurls him into the mud and shame and falseness of the war.

Thus ends this book—a book so packed with the deepest experience of mankind, so broad in its philosophic range and profound in its vision, so intricate despite the superb clarity and order—lucidus ordo—of style and structure, that it will not reveal all its fulness or greatness to one year or even to one generation of readers. It is, as Goethe said of Faust, incommensurable. It is hard to define or describe. Much nonsense will be talked about it and I shall be living from now on in some fear of the English translation, which only a great artist and a trained thinker could undertake with any hope of measurable success. But it is with the fullest sense of sober, critical responsibility that I may, on the one hand, call "Der Zauberberg" the Divine Comedy, no less perfect for its prose form, of our disastrous age, and, on the other hand, liken the great debates in it to those Platonic dialogues that have carried both thoughts and voices across the millennia, and yet assert that the book remains a novel, an epic narrative, enlarging and also heightening, of course, the very concept of the novel by what it is. And if our age is indeed a disastrous one, the disaster is mitigated by the vigilant nobility of such a spirit as that of Thomas Mann.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Religion and Emotion

The Psychology of Religious Mysticism. By James Leuba. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.50.

The Psychology of Emotion, Morbid and Normal. By John T. MacCurdy. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.50.

MR. LEUBA'S book offers the most successful attempt in the English language to penetrate to the heart of mysticism. As Vaughan's vapid "Hours with the Mystics" was superseded by Dean Inge's volume, so is the latter now superseded by this learned work. To the lover of grand mysticism the book will be disappointing, for the results are negative. What William James called the radiant core of things is found to be natural, not supernatural; a lamp illumined by human effort, not engendered by divine light. The author's aim is to show that the interior or hidden life is not to be confined to Christianity or, in fact, to any religion, and that its motivation is not supernal but of the earth. The experiences he treats include all the indescribable impressions covered by the term illumination or revelation. Their traits—suddenness, unexpectedness, passivity, illumination, ineffability—are not characteristic of human religious life alone. Psychical storms ending in ecstasy are due to intoxication by the open air, by great heights, by drugs such as mescal, hasheesh, and ether, by alcohol, by love sacred or profane—in short, to causes good, bad, or indifferent.

Poetic frenzy should be added to these, for among the propagandists for belief in the transcendental nature of mystical ecstasy great poets hold a dominant position. Certain suppressed poems of Tennyson show this, as do the works of Wordsworth and Longfellow. The author quotes from Miss Spurgeon's valuable little book on "Mysticism in English Literature." He might have added a reference to the works of Walt Whitman, in which may be found all of James's marks of mysticism and also that pantheistic spirit, that "feeling of a presence," to which Mr. Leuba's personal philosophy seems to incline. Indeed his last destructive chapter on the disappearance of belief in a God-Providence amenable to human influence might well be supplemented by a study of a possible substitute. This is that form of monism ranging from Giordano Bruno's "world-soul animating all" to Whitman's "Leaves of Grass"—all quite in harmony with the author's final words: "The consciousness of being one with the whole, the faith that the universe is somehow rational, and the mental unity, strength, peace, and happiness which come to the possessor of these virtues and beliefs are in no way exclusively bound to the conception of the personal God of the Christian books of worship."

So much for the methods and conclusions of this book of extraordinary interest. The historical part is equally interesting. In the examination of the grand mystics the author is both sympathetic and critical. The psychiatrist, as physician of the soul, is one who understands the mystic moods and is, at the same time, able to penetrate to causes. As he puts it: "However it may be produced, ecstasy is ecstasy, just as fever is fever whatever its cause. The truth-kernel of religious ecstasy is no other than the truth-kernel of narcotic intoxication and of the ecstatic trance in general. Beliefs in divine presence, in divine union, and in illumination or revelation come under the field of unusual and abnormal mental phenomena." Yet the author does not hesitate to say that the Christian believers have come nearer to a just appreciation of mystical life than the materialistic scientists. In 1902 he wrote of the mystics: "Until recently the few scientists who had cast a more or less disdainful eye upon them had noted little more than ecstasies, visions, catalepsies, extravagant penances, and they had imagined that the word 'hysteria' explained everything." During the twenty years that have elapsed the scientific interest in religious mysticism has grown apace, and Professor Royce's high praise would need but a little toning down to express Mr. Leuba's opinion: "Mysticism has been the ferment of the faiths, the forerunner of spiritual liberty, the inaccessible refuge of the nobler heretics, the inspirer, through poetry, of countless youth who knew no metaphysics, the comforter of those who are weary of finitude. It has determined, directly or indirectly, more than half the technical theology of the church." Of course, adds the critic, this does not mean that a mystic is one who is "in touch with the absolute and eternal" or one who has "passed out of the finite into the infinite world." That is an exaggeration due to a literal dependence on the words of the great mystics whose writings are marred by an inexactness approaching at times to deliberate falsehood.

What really do the mystics seek? They say they want "God." But what do they want when they want "God"? Mr. Leuba's list of wants ranges from tendencies to self-affirmation and the need for self-esteem to "organic" needs or needs for sensuous satisfaction (especially in connection with sex). But these springs of action, present in every civilized individual, fell foul of two great ideals of monastic Christianity, namely, self-surrender to God's will, and chastity. Needs were one thing, ideals another, and the consequent conflict between the two is portrayed in a masterly manner. Mr. Leuba's insistence on the sex-conflict has met with much criticism, but, as he points out, not one of the prominent representatives of mysticism lived a normal married life, and many of the curious phenomena to which great mystics owe in part their fame or notoriety are due to perturbations of the sex function consequent upon its repression. For this unconventional interpretation Mr. Leuba gives ample grounds. Thus he points out that in cases of tendency to self-affirmation mystics will not tolerate the "inferiority complex." The desire to attract attention and to play a distinguished role is written large in the works not only of Santa Theresa and Madame Guyon but of Francis of Assisi and Ignatius Loyola.

In contrast to Mr. Leuba's studies of mysticism, which emphasize its normal aspects, the object of Mr. MacCurdy's work is to gather data from clinical researches into the mental mechanics resulting in systems of manic-depressive insanity. This book is written on the assumption that the mind can work outside of awareness, and uses the hypothesis of unconscious mental processes which not merely parallel consciousness but actually support and nourish it. To prove his theory he uses clinical material gathered for over a dozen years at the Psychiatric Institute of the New York State hospitals. Much of the volume is taken up with exact reports of what patients say and do, regardless of the pertinence of these observations for any particular theory. The author's effort to describe mental symptoms in terms of common speech is not successful. His elaborate glossary shows that. But the verbatim reports are certainly interesting. They furnish peeps into the mad house. The stupor reactions, the involution melancholias, the manic anxiety and perplexity states present magnified forms of morbid activity and throw much light on what is going on about us in everyday life. There are samples of manic poetry which remind one of Gertrude Stein with her "free associations." There are dream poems which are as subtle and meaningless as the effusions of Edna St. Vincent Millay. As for religious obsessions, the patients of Ward's Island are exaggerated examples of Mrs. Eddy with her Father-Mother God and of John Alexander Dowie and his prophetic mouthings, and in many cases of sublimation the whole program of the Uplifters and New Thoughters is written large.

Taken in such a way this volume raises a certain hope. If the institutional cases have often been "discharged cured," why should not the public be rid of certain cults that plague it? The propagandists are probably hopeless. They carry on as they do because it pays. But their admirers may cease to be admirers provided they can be shown that the poems and prophecies, the rhapsodies and orphic utterances are but the results of unconscious mental processes of a psychopathic type. Yet even the propagandists might do well to read this learned work. An improved Pelmanism might include the "fifty-seven characteristics" noted in the depressive make-up, such as lack of confidence, shyness, sensitiveness, discontent, over-conscientiousness, and slowness in assuming responsibility. Instead of being, as advertised, the dog with his tail between his legs, the man with the new mental make-up would show confidence, boldness, a thick skin, self-content, no trace of the New England conscience, and a willingness to shoulder all the responsibilities of a Henry Ford from jitneys to Jews. Psychiatry thus applied might Americanize the universe. We are therefore thankful that this profound work is hard reading. Fifteen minutes a day will never master it.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

William Graham Sumner

William Graham Sumner. By Harris E. Starr. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

SUMNER stands easily first among the few Americans since Thomas Paine who have had the courage and the perspicacity to talk common sense. Paine was reputed an infidel and Sumner wore the surplice; but the two men were brothers under their skins. Writing simply and clearly, Mr. Starr has portrayed a masculine man who was as gentle and kindly as he was pugnacious. The portrait comports with the singularly beautiful frontispiece, reproduced from a photograph. No one who has thought of Sumner as a "hard" man will be able to think so of him again after a sincere contemplation of these two likenesses.

What was it in Sumner which made him deserve such a biography? First, he was a fine product of Americanization supplemented by European study, and a convincing justification of our Americanizing agencies. He was born in the United States, but his parents were immigrants from Lancashire, where mechanics, weavers, and other wage-earners who happen to have good minds become contentious rationalists in philosophy, hard-headed utilitarians in politics, and narrow nonconformists in religion. Sumner grew up in the atmosphere created by these attitudes and he was hard-headed by original nature, but he was susceptible to beauty and to truth however labeled. He became an Episcopalian and a rector. He was fascinated by "folkways" and could write of them without prejudice, however morally repugnant to him they sometimes were. These conversions were phases of his Americanization. Secondly, he had the divine gift of the inspiring teacher, and thousands of Yale men remember him with admiration and affection, Republicans and protectionists no less than Democrats and free traders. He was interested in every page of American history, and in his biographies of Alexander Hamilton, Andrew Jackson, and Robert Morris he reveals an almost uncanny understanding of American political thought and feeling. As opportunity offered he took part in legislation and in local administrative responsibilities, but always and above all he was a student and investigator of truly scientific temper. He had convictions and fought for them fiercely. He could say sharp things which now and then sounded cruel. But he never was cruel in fact. Like his intellect, his sympathies were wide-ranging and deep, and he never thought of sparing himself in kindly deeds or in resolute service to men who needed his sinewy help—if they were worth helping.

There were unlovely traits in Sumner, and Mr. Starr has made no attempt to conceal them. A Puritan strain manifested itself; neighbors and acquaintances who didn't know right from wrong, or, knowing, failed to do right, were instructed and admonished in the good old Roundhead way. As a boy William was undeniably a moral prig and got himself disliked. In 1859 he entered Yale.

The Yale of that time, as it has been described by J. Frederick Kernichan and Henry Holt, produced upon vigorous-minded students much the same impression that Harvard did upon Henry Adams, but Mr. Starr discriminatingly remarks that Sumner, who was conventionally religious, could not have been as disgusted as was Holt, who already was a radical. Before his class was graduated Sumner, excused from attending commencement exercises, was on his way to Europe. Before he left he had been drafted for the army, but he had no intention to go into service if he could keep out of it, and his father put up the money for a substitute. Three years of travel and study on the Continent and in England broadened the young man and took a good many kinks out of him. Returning to America in 1866, he taught at Yale as a tutor until 1869. He had become interested in what he called Biblical Science, the German brand, and was cherishing a desire to enter the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He plunged into church activities and edited a religious paper which survived one year. All this activity was to the good because, in the course of it, Sumner cut loose cleanly from dogma and dogmatism. By thirty he had married and been ordained, and had entered upon his duties as rector of the Church of the Redeemer at Morristown, New Jersey. He enjoyed his work there and was much beloved, but in 1872 he accepted the newly created chair of political and social science at Yale, where he was to do his real work as teacher and author. He could not, however, be a merely academic student of politics. During the thirty-eight years of his professorship there were only about six, Mr. Starr says, in which Sumner did not discharge arduous labors as a director of community or State affairs.

As a teacher of college students Sumner was unrivaled. Mark Hopkins has perhaps been more talked about, but he was never in the same class with Sumner. Hopkins could inspire and direct young men into safe ways, and that was much; but Sumner could make them think, and that was extraordinary. What is more, he made the public think. Tirelessly he lectured, wrote essays, and reviewed books. Fortunately a great part of his intellectual output as a publicist was written down, and his loyal friend and editor, Albert G. Keller, has collected and published it. No one who heard Sumner's characterizations of bunk and fallacy from Sumner's lips or who has read them in print will forget them. His one intention was to tell what he believed to be the truth and it did not matter whom he angered. It is safe to say that no other writer has more dazzlingly illuminated democracy than Sumner did in the dozen words of a chapter title: That Every Man Is a Sovereign but That a Sovereign Cannot Take Tips.

But readers who are qualified to have an opinion will probably agree with Mr. Starr that Sumner was greatest as a sociologist, and those of Sumner's friends who knew him intimately must be sure that the man himself felt that constructive work in the domain of a science of society was his big job. No man who has worked in this domain has been less irritated than Sumner was by newspaper and platform gibes at sociology. He had the true scientific spirit, and cared not at all whether sociology should become a pretentious science or not. What concerned him was the necessity that serious-minded men should study human society in a scientific spirit and by scientific methods. He welcomed Herbert Spencer's work and got himself into trouble with the Yale authorities by using the "Study of Sociology" as a textbook. In that affair he proved himself to be a wise no less than a courageous protagonist of academic freedom. The Yale theologians held that Spencer's book was dangerously irreligious, but they could not deny that Sumner was as sincerely religious as they were, and they never caught him off guard.

Sumner did not live to complete the systematic treatise on sociology for which he had accumulated a great mass of material and notes. These have been worked over and organized by Keller, and it is expected that the work will be published within another year or two. "Folkways," the one important sociological book that Sumner completed, was instantly welcomed as a contribution of first-rate importance. Its value has never been questioned, and it will stand as an enduring part of the science of society. No mere argument could have so completely demonstrated the importance of "folkways" and "mores" as the tissue of human society, and nothing could have been more congenial to Sumner than to establish such a fact.

FRANKLIN H. GIDDINGS

Fire and Steel

The Creative Life. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

IF an Italian painter of the Renaissance, one of those amazing spirits for whom Vasari was Plutarch and Boswell, were to read "The Creative Life" I imagine he would disagree with hardly a word of it. He might, indeed, marvel that its theme could ever have to be argued at such length and in such detail. He would take for granted most of what it advances as a challenge, and he would think of art rather as a triumph of the artist over himself than as a triumph of the artist over a society which wishes he would somehow be another kind of artist. But the man of the Renaissance would agree that > toward the preservation through conformity of the existing forms of life. It is a will that strives beyond the good- that may, when embodied in life and thought, becom- new saviors and insurgents to liberate mankind from his tastes and powers. For the race it is not enough. A people that crushes the creative will has only an Egyptian

With more precision and yet with more variety than may be found in any other recent critical book, Mr. Lewisohn puts the case for the artist, whether in any of the arts or in conduct itself. Among Americans he is of the line of Emerson and Thoreau and Whitman, of whom in one of his finest essays he points out that they are now too often regarded as venerable men, conformable to the national tradition, when actually they were all, in their day, cargoes of dynamite feared by the safe watchers at almost every port. Mr. Lewisohn has long been aware of the growth in the United States of a kind of Roman unity of manners and opinion. He has observed an increasing tendency on the part of the majority to hold that it is the duty of the artist, as of other citizens, to bend his will to public usefulness, to help the most wide-spread opinions to spread further, to encourage the sentiments which have grown standard, and to represent in art the aspects of human nature which the self-satisfied would best like to see represented. Against this conception of the artist's function Mr. Lewisohn fights. "Art is not a profession; it differs in kind from teaching and healing and pleading causes. . . . Art is the life process in its totality. The poet, the experiencing one, is a poet in every moment, in every relation. . . . His vision is his constant self. His material is not stone or iron or market values or laws; it is love and aspiration and ecstasy. His business is with fundamentals." How, then, can the artist tamely adjust himself to advantageous prudence? He cannot do it. Society is not original; it is derivative; it is merely the convenient pattern in which at any moment men have formed themselves. But the original substance is the individual, who becomes important in proportion as his originality rises to creation. If he meanly compromises, he wastes something precious which cannot be spared. If society forces him into subordination, it is as if the hands and feet should subdue the brain and heart.

Mr. Lewisohn does not regard the artist, however, as a mere detached flame, burning its own fuel to produce its own heat. He regards him as a member of that large society which is all mankind. For this reason, a provincial conformity can never be enough. The artist must take the longest views, must free himself from all local and temporal prejudices. What discipline, then, must he choose to give him form instead of chaotic expansiveness? Mr. Lewisohn believes that the artist must shape his own discipline out of his own instincts. How is he to know which of his instincts are authentic? By searching within himself so long and remorselessly that he can no longer be deceived, and selecting those instincts which are most sincere, direct, and intense. There is, Mr. Lewisohn agrees with the Greeks, no measure for the universe but man. Truth is to be found in the specific, not in the general. An honest man is the only work of God which can be trusted. And in the long run, one honest man will be found to be much like any other honest man. For the artist to know himself is to know the best that can be known; for him to give free utterance to himself is to do all that can be done to give truthful utterance to the realities of inarticulate humanity.

Though Mr. Lewisohn worships fire, he uses steel. He has no sympathy with sprawling violence in art. Swift is his favorite model for prose, Goethe is his ideal critic. While he can be patient with certain writers whose chief merit is their effort to be sincere, he prefers those who succeed in such an effort. For to have succeeded thus is merely to have gone deeper into truth than other writers go who are troubled by the menaces of censorship and the pleadings of respectability. Whatever is truly authentic, Mr. Lewisohn believes, can be made clear. A shapeless or spasmodic or lurid book is the sign that its author has not fixed his eye austerely upon his vision, but has feebly turned aside, perhaps out of some mistaken concession to his audience.

"The Creative Life" is an arraignment of the casual audience which, particularly in contemporary America, demands that the artist come too far to meet it; but the book is also a defense of that eventual audience which, Mr. Lewisohn thinks, awaits all genuine excellence. In the name of the second audience, Mr. Lewisohn, with a pointed and lovely pen, denounces the first. He multiplies instances. He ranges over scattered fields, approaching his argument from every direction. There is scarcely an objection that he does not meet. There is scarcely a figure in contemporary literature whom he does not touch, shrewdly and justly. Yet in the end he gives the impression less of a journalist who has collected a volume of miscellaneous essays than of a scholar who has painstakingly evolved a treatise. However diverse the illustrations, there is only one central theme. If there is a mounting apprehension in the United States of the need of just such doctrine as this critic expounds, it is in no small part due to the firm, logical, eloquent art with which for half a dozen years Mr. Lewisohn has been expounding it.

CARL VAN DOREN

Portrait of a Man with Red Hair. By Hugh Walpole. George H. Doran Company. $2.

IT takes all sorts of St. Georges and slimy dragons to make a world for novelists to play in, and Hugh Walpole has always been a very special sort of St. George riding down the horrid dragon of modern realism. Ever since he came mounted on his first stallion, "The Wooden Horse," he has gone about armed with virtue and looking for scaled monsters to demolish with a fine charge of bright words and all kinds of encouragement to other young men vowed to the sacred cause of what he calls romance. Of late years he has taken younger writers under his particular dispensation and informed the public that romance is coming again into her own and that dragons lie waiting to be slain. At one time he planned or appeared to plan a set of novels called The Rising City which somehow was going to include the life of our own time. It began with "Fortitude" and "The Duchess of Wrexe" and trailed off somehow like a lopped dragon's tail, and now these novels are listed simply as The London Novels and "The Dark Forest" and "The Secret City" are listed as just novels. Has Mr. Walpole lost faith in his skill at building a rising city and does his sentimental flight into books like "Jeremy" and "Portrait of a Man with Red Hair" mean that he has bitten off more dragon than he can chew?

If it were not for the reputation and the importance attached by all sorts of persons and publics to the name of Hugh Walpole there would be no special reason for so serious an investigation of his success at busting dragons. He began by being one of those promising younger novelists whose later works stretch out like promissory notes at a low rate of discount. He has ended by growing more and more sentimental about his heroines and more and more explicit about the world's need of purity and romance and more and more severe on the sins of modern realism. "Modern cleverness," he exclaims in his latest work, "has taken one's beliefs away, modern stupidity has deprived one of the possibility of romance. No God, no heroes any more." It isn't any new charge which Mr. Walpole is bringing against the dragon of the slime. Ever since his first book he has tried to substitute something for the omissions of this century. His formula never varies; and even where he calls his "Portrait of a Man with Red Hair" a "romantic macabre" he is simply ringing changes on the ideas of "Prelude to Adventure" and "The Green Mirror" and "The Gods and Mr. Perrin." One may protest that all this bears little resemblance to the true romance.

The plot of the last book is the plot of the first book; and that is very little objection, provided only that the plot brings enchantment to its capture of the dragon. Mr. Walpole always has a bashful lonely young-old man desperately anxious to stop being bashful and lonely in a world which has made him not a soldier and always afraid. He goes by the name of Maradick or Galleon or Harkness. Somehow in the heart of life glitters a golden adventure which calls him just once or forever p[illegible] him by in his shyness and his ingrowing loneliness. It may be war or the Russian revolution or writing a novel or (as in the case of "Fortitude") marrying a girl who keeps him from real life so that he at last solves things by going out and talking to the ocean. As often as not he goes to some Cornish town and knows before his departure that romance waits for him in some mysterious enterprise and that he simply must not fail his trust. For any number of pages Mr. Walpole clucks round him and explains him and mothers him generally while you cry aloud for the story to get started. At last something exciting catches the hero and encompasses him in an ecstasy shared at great length by Mr. Walpole, and then he has something to do with helping a young girl before whose purity and grace Mr. Walpole himself is utterly prostrate in golden words. At last the young-old man proves his mettle by being unselfish and giving up the girl to a younger man and shaking off the rigid sheath of his bashfulness and slaying dragons and making himself generally useful and ending by being lonely but serene in a proved fortitude. All along the way Mr. Walpole is very edifying.

It is a very special kind of romance which would be acceptable enough if only Mr. Walpole really could spin a yarn. In the preface to "Portrait of a Man with Red Hair" he protests he has done no more than just write a story. He invents a horrible pale man who wants to torture a young girl and locks her in a tower and captures her two knights-errant and tries to torture them and at last gets thrown off the tower into the sea. It takes Mr. Walpole nearly a hundred pages to explain the situation and his hero. It takes him thirty or forty pages to have the hero and the girl sit near the ocean and recognize each other's purity and merit. The story pads round and round a house where something horrible is about to happen while Mr. Walpole talks and talks about romance and landscape and etchings and pure young girls. After any amount of preparation he takes you into the house and keeps you there possibly one minute while he pushes the villain through the window.

Unless he is as good as Algernon Blackwood there is not much use in any other writer trying to make an Algernon Blackwood story. It isn't a question of Mr. Walpole's good intentions or the niceness of his characters. It is simply that he has no story to tell and any amount of lectures to deliver. He sends you flying away from younger novelists still promising and promising. You go packing toward Algernon Blackwood's "Dr. John Silence" and "The Willows" and "Max Hensig" and "The Wendigo"—where you are promised horror and where you get horror, and a thrill, and literary genius.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Castlereagh and Canning

The Foreign Policy of Castlereagh. By C. K. Webster. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.50.

The Foreign Policy of Canning. By H. W. Temperley. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.50.

THESE two volumes are complementary to each other, and no student of European history in the last hundred years can afford to neglect them. They are based on monumental erudition; probably there is no dispatch of importance in European archives which their writers have overlooked. If they do not come to us with the force of novelty that is largely [illegible] us for at least the outline of their conclusions. But in the fulness and patience of their analysis, in the scrupulous accu[illegible] interest in their subject not merely as connected narrative but [illegible] business of the critic is to congratulate their authors, and to express his gratitude for their labors.

Mr. Webster, I believe, has had the more difficult task. Castlereagh is not an easy figure to make intelligible. The mists of prejudice have surrounded his reputation; and where the pens of Byron and Cobbett have been sharpened to destroy, it is not easy to rebuild. There is, moreover, justification for not a little of the attitude taken by the early radicals; for whatever the attitude of Castlereagh in foreign politics, in domestic affairs he had no grasp of the ideals or needs of his generation. And whatever the merit of his foreign policy, it was difficult for contemporaries to do justice to him. He worked in an atmosphere of secrecy. He was unconcerned to consult, much less to create, what there then was of an English public opinion. A bad speaker, a character melancholy and morose, a man born without friends and incapable of inspiring affection, he was not a figure to command attraction. It is the great merit of Mr. Webster's book that despite the difficulties he has been able to show us a figure of very striking proportions. No one, after this, can deny him either boldness of conception or energy of execution. He was not, indeed, always successful; but his policy secured for Britain a position of supremacy in Europe, and the end he sought to serve was the great end of maintaining peace by international cooperation. He may have been in advance of his age in venturing so to dream; but at least it must be noted that men so able and so shrewd as John Quincy Adams did not think so. What, indeed, we do not know is how far Castlereagh grasped the implications of a pacified Europe as the growth of democratic habits was to reveal them. After all, as Mr. Webster admits, the purpose of the alliance he maintained was purely conservative. He himself had no sense of, or desire for, popular support. He did not and could not explain to his fellow-citizens what he desired. He was, in short, a great product of a decaying system; after 1832 his habits and temper would have been impossible.

The fault of Mr. Webster's book, if it has a fault, is a certain heaviness in the handling of the material. No reader can say that of Mr. Temperley's. He has obviously enjoyed writing it, and he conveys his sense of enjoyment to his reader. Canning was the Winston Churchill of his age. He could talk about everything with wit and ingenuity; he could talk about few things with profundity. He was a brilliant administrator who somehow never quite convinced you that he was a man of principle. There is about all he did what Bagehot called a certain dexterous insincerity which made you want to yield without the sense that you ought to yield to his charm. Even if he announced great principles you were never quite sure he believed in them. Even if he did generous things you were never certain that he did them for their own sake Of certain historic charges Mr. Temperley, I think, does successfully dispose. He shows that Canning was not merely a brilliant persifleur. He makes it clear that he was able to bend his mind to really hard thinking, that he could grapple with the inner substance of a great subject. He was not the mere charlatan of genius he appeared to his opponents. No student of political science can afford to neglect the instructive chapter in which Mr. Temperley describes the working of the Foreign Office under him; that is an account of a man who was capable of administration on the grand scale. And Canning the novus homo is, clearly, a portent of no inconsiderable kind. His use of opinion as a weapon and his treatment of America are both activities of which only a man sensible of a new spirit in affairs would have been capable. Mr. Temperley does not entirely persuade us to regard his policy as so entirely a unified intellectual scheme as he himself sees it; but he does persuade us to a deeper respect for the man himself and a regret that he was not given ampler opportunity to translate his policy into terms of the event.

War-Time Diaries

An Ambassador's Memoirs. By Maurice Paléologue. George H. Doran Company. Three volumes. $22.50.

The Diary of Lord Bertie, 1914-1918. Edited by Lady Algernon Gordon Lennox. George H. Doran Company. Two volumes. $10.

DIARIES should be indiscreet; they should not be written with a weather-eye on posterity. Maurice Paléologue, French Ambassador at St. Petersburg when the war broke out, was too finished a diplomat not to think of possible readers every time he took a pen in hand; hence his diaries lack the freshness of crotchety old Lord Bertie's. Paléologue's picture of his own enthusiasm for the war in the dark days of July, 1914, is, to be sure, more revealing than he meant it to be—even in these volumes, slightly toned down from the version which appeared in the Revue des deux Mondes. And he has a French sense of the dramatic which gives life to his account of the Rasputin affair and color to his story of the decay of Czarist Russia.

Lord Bertie, British Ambassador in Paris, jotted down his thoughts day by day with no eye to the reader. He frankly expresses his opinion that Zionism is "rot" and his hope that the American troops will stay on the French front—where troubles will arise with the French rather than with the British. And he is direct in his record of his own distrust of Russia in the July days. "It seems incredible that the Russian Government should plunge Europe into war in order to make themselves the protectors of the Servians," he wrote on July 26. "If the Emperor of Russia adhere to the absurd and obsolete claim that she is protectress of all Slav states, however bad their conduct, war is probable," he wrote a day later; and on July 28 he notes the return of Isvolsky, the Russian Ambassador: "He will do a good deal of mischief in fomenting a war spirit here." On July 30 Lord Bertie wrote: "The French should put pressure on the Russian Government to moderate their zeal. If we gave an assurance of armed assistance to France and Russia now, Russia would become more exacting and France would have to follow in her wake. The newspapers, but not yet the people, are becoming bellicose." And on July 31: "Isvolsky goes about declaring that Russia is ready and war inevitable. What a fool, even if it be the truth!" After the Germans had invaded Belgium, and England had declared war, Bertie went war-mad like the rest, and hated a pacifist as much as a Zionist.

Such a frank record of the mood of England's responsible representative in Paris, watching the conflict draw near, is a useful corrective of the distorted mirror of those days which propagandists have since made all but universal.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

The Relation of Wealth to Welfare. By William A. Robson. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

"THE peculiar curse of our age is what may be called the Monetary interpretation of Welfare. . . . It is, in short, the general identification of wealth with welfare, and in particular the confusion of private wealth not only with the common good but also with the welfare of the owner thereof, that leads men to waste their substance in a vain and rapacious scramble for the power to acquire possessions and command services that bring satisfaction neither to themselves nor to others, but which nevertheless deprive whole hosts of their fellow creatures of true forms of well-being." Around this idea Mr. Robson has written a big little book. On the positive side he asks:

> If we find that private income does not yield to its possessor all or some of the most essential elements of welfare, in what other quarter should we seek them? One source that may be suggested is public expenditure and collective action by the community as a whole, considered not as mere potential forms of associated effort existing in the ideal programs of social reformers, but regarded more definitely in the light of the contribution which they actually make to the life of the individual under present conditions.

Of the infinitude of complex elements that make up human welfare Mr. Robson deals with four, all of them highly important—health, art, work, and education. The chapter on health, one of the best in the book, clearly illustrates the main thesis. As the author demonstrates, above the mere subsistence level increased income makes very slight contribution, if any, to better personal health. On the other hand, "most of the conditions of personal health are, in fact, more dependent upon public control than upon private income, once a minimum of decency has been secured by the latter." The two hundred tons of impurity that hang suspended in the air over London on a foggy morning affect rich and poor alike. Not all his gold can shield the modern Midas from the nerve-racking noises of our modern Sardises and Babylons. Not the wealth of the individual but the vigilant eye of the public inspector defends the rich man, like the poor one, against impure water and tainted milk, against typhoid-carrying oysters and other poisoned food. It is becoming increasingly clear, as Mr. Robson remarks, that there is almost no such thing as private health; for rich and poor alike must depend on collective public action to maintain the conditions which make personal health possible. The public-health service is in truth not simply a "spending" but an "earning" service. It distributes its invaluable earnings, however, in kind, without increasing the money income of the receivers. "A necessary condition of increased effort in this field is a realization that a diminution of private income may be more than compensated for by the receipt of a larger income in terms of health." This last simple and obvious truth offers a key to the whole of Mr. Robson's argument—which demolishes not only the basic assumption, but consequently a large part of the practical precepts, of the omnipresent and pestiferous business economist.

Turning from health, what is more important for genuine human well-being than the appreciation of art and the development of creative artistic activity? Yet, in the suggestive words of Vernon Lee, "Material possession has no aesthetic meaning. We possess a beautiful object with our soul; the possession thereof with our hand or our legal rights brings us no nearer the beauty." Riches convey no power of artistic appreciation; hence the obvious logic of liberal collective expenditures for public picture galleries and museums, for concerts, beautiful buildings, bridges, monuments, statues, parks and gardens. It is too largely true, as Mr. Robson points out with some exaggeration, that the tendency of the unregulated self-interest of the capitalist entrepreneur is to develop the modern city "into a hideous collection of slums and factories and office buildings which offend the eye and petrify the aesthetic faculties," and that the community in its collective capacity has been responsible for almost every town-improvement scheme and in general for all measures intended to create a more artistic municipal environment. But none of these manifestations, whether of hideosity or of beauty, find expression either in the money income of the individual or in his so-called "real" income, the flow of goods and services that he receives.

Drawing the whole argument together, the power of private income, beyond a very modest minimum, to increase the welfare of its possessor in respect of the four essential elements is small; that of collective action and public expenditure, comparatively great. Second, neither the welfare that a man derives from the enjoyment of these elements of the good life nor his deprivation in their absence appears recognizably either in his money income or in his so-called "real" income. Private income is a bad index of welfare, and we have no right to base our economic scheme on the assumption that increase of income necessarily increases the welfare of its possessor. We must learn to think less in terms of money income, more in terms of the various elements of welfare as they affect the lives of individual men and women, and therefore to pay much more attention to the conscious control by the community of the social and economic environment. The income that is really important is not an income of money, or even of goods and services, but of the various elements of welfare, and in large part they seem to be best provided by collective, not individual, activity. Evaluating life in terms of life, we shall no longer be able to rely on the desire for more wealth as an adequate incentive to work. And then? Not stagnation and not Utopia; but once we learn to think of material well-being in terms of non-monetary individual welfare, we may go forward and begin to build the world into the land of heart's desire.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Colonel Mitchell's Book

Winged Defence. By Colonel William Mitchell. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

EACH of the generals now sitting as judges in the trial of Colonel Mitchell should be equipped with a desk copy of "Winged Defence." Colonel Mitchell in this book presses hard for recognition of air power and directs an extremely bold attack against our military establishment and its honored traditions. He rips open the war and navy departments and lays bare the colossal waste of our obsolete navy and the general futility of field armies. The army and navy for him are relics of past wars. Air forces operating swiftly over great distances will decide future wars. Colonel Mitchell would establish a single Department of National Defense under which would come the air service, the army, and the navy.

Colonel Mitchell has set himself a tremendous task in trying to bring about this reorganization. Military men are safely immune to innovation. The cross-bow men in the Middle Ages coexisted for a long time with the musketeers, and the British fleet used sail long after the appearance of steamships. Hindenburg in his Tannenberg campaign is said to have followed the tactics of Hannibal, and the fleets in the late war those of Actium and Trafalgar. Our own services have rested undisturbed since Civil War days. It took the contaminated-food scandal of Spanish-American War times to bring about the consolidation of the quartermaster and supply departments—a trifling detail in comparison with Colonel Mitchell's project. Even Admiral Sims, the leading radical of the navy, cannot break completely with tradition. He ridicules the battleship and coast defenses as toys and calls for a strong air force—but an air force divided and subordinated to the old established services.

Colonel Mitchell supports his case with a mass of interesting acts, records, and opinions. His own experiences during the war as commander of our overseas air force, his recent experience as assistant chief of our air service, and his intimate knowledge of world aviation give him an authoritative status which army and navy chiefs cannot lightly brush aside. Congressmen, to whom the book is in part dedicated, may be swept off their feet by his fire and sincerity; but some of them may wonder at his claims. Aircraft alone will fight the next war, with scout planes fighting for air supremacy, with bombing planes destroying the economic life of the enemy country. The army will remain, but merely as a police force at home and an occupation force abroad. The navy, except for the submarine, has no place in future wars. The battleship is obsolete before it is completed, an outrageous waste of public wealth and an easy prey to aircraft. The complete cost of a modern battleship is not $45,000,000, as commonly supposed, but with its accessories $100,000,000. This vast sum would furnish, ready for action, 4,000 airplanes any one of which could sink the battleship. The bombing trials proved, in spite of the navy's misleading statements, that "aircraft today can sink or destroy any vessels that have ever been built or can ever be constructed." Our expensive coast defenses are also doomed, as our air force will take over this work of coast defense, attacking seacraft at long distance from the coast. This fact should interest our Congressmen, as "every time a large seacoast cannon is installed it costs half a million dollars. In the ten years preceding 1920 the United States expended about $1,800,000,000 on coast defenses." But Colonel Mitchell strays into strange pastures when he discusses disarmament. He would make the bombing plane a dove of peace. Aircraft would destroy things instead of lives. Even the layman will wonder how Colonel Mitchell's bombing peace doves will manage to destroy the economic life of a country without taking with it a goodly portion of the population. He also maintains that the devastating

The Tariff Again

A New American Commercial Policy as Evidenced by Section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1922. By Wallace McClure. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.

THERE are signs that the tariff, which of late has not been an active issue in American politics, may before long resume something of its old place of importance in Congress and in the country. If it does, Dr. McClure's book will prove a useful storehouse of facts and an interesting arsenal of protectionist arguments. Section 317 of the Fordney-McCumber tariff, to which Dr. McClure devotes his nearly four hundred pages, provides (to quote the author's summary) that > whenever the President finds as a fact that any country (1) imposes upon the disposition in, transportation through, or reexportation from its territory any unreasonable exaction upon any product of the United States which is not equally enforced upon similar products of every foreign country; or (2) discriminates against the commerce of the United States by law or administration with respect to import, export, or other duties, regulations, or restrictions in such a way as to place the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country; and when he finds that the public interests will be served thereby, he is directed to proclaim new or additional duties, calculated to offset the unequal imposition upon American commerce, but not exceeding 50 per cent ad valorem, upon the importation of any or all of the products of the discriminating foreign country. If this procedure proves ineffective he may proclaim absolute prohibition.

Dr. McClure admits that the tariff act of 1922 is "high-protectionist to the core," and that while the provisions of Section 317 "are consonant with a policy of protection, it must nevertheless be recognized that a foreign policy which seeks markets and demands the Open Door is not consistent with a domestic policy of virtual prohibition." In other words, the act itself embodies a theory which may go far toward nullifying the policy of the section in question. In addition, he is able to point out no less than eleven paragraphs of the act which are inconsistent with the policy of Section 317 and two other clauses whose bearing is doubtful. Nevertheless, he supports the flexible or defensive policy of the section because in theory the Fordney-McCumber act, as he sees it, contemplates a most-favored-nation treatment of international commerce by the United States, and accordingly should lead, if properly and fully applied, to the negotiation of commercial treaties embodying the most-favored-nation principle. He is careful to insist, however, that the application of such a policy should be unconditional. The "American interpretation" which consists in combining preferences and reservations with a most-favored-nation policy seems to him "a scarcely surmountable obstacle" to the development of "the more far-reaching purposes" of the act, and such an interpretation ought to be abandoned in favor of a policy to which no strings are attached.

It will probably seem to most opponents of protection that the spacious policy which Dr. McClure champions will not, even when applied in the comprehensive fashion for which he pleads, turn out to be anything more than another elaborate device for supplying American industry and trade with a government crutch, or further the international good feeling in commercial matters of which the world at present is very much in need. It may enliven industry and commerce by a bountiful and all-round administration of stimulants, but we shall still be trying to coerce the foreigner into doing business in our way, and practicing favoritism in the name of the general good. However, Dr. McClure is entitled to state his case and urge his plea, and his book is a scholarly and useful piece of work. His account of the most-favored-nation policy as pursued hitherto by the United States, of the open-door policy where it has been advocated or applied, and of the policies of other nations which have resorted to special tariff bargaining or imperial preferences, is an instructive compendium of information which it will be worth while to have at hand when the next debate over the great American fetich comes on.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

A Puritan Pagan

Lord Timothy Dexter of Newburyport, Mass. By J. P. Marquand. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

THE tide of biography, now running at the full, brings in odder and still odder bits of flotsam and jetsam. Interest —the interest of the publishers and biographers, at least— centers more and more upon the grotesque and the bizarre rather than upon the normal. Not infrequently the results are thin or, what is worse, merely theatrical; but, while the present work falls wholly within the category of fantastic biography, it is both a highly desirable book and one that leaves little to be desired. Mr. Marquand portrays his unheard-of hero with just the amount of inflated gravity and sympathetic insight that he deserved. One closes the book feeling that Lord Timothy himself, whose aspiring soul was never satisfied with anything that this vain world affords, would actually be almost pleased with this tribute to his greatness.

For Lord Timothy Dexter was a combined misanthrope and sybarite. As one follows his rococo career one constantly feels that here was an American Dean Swift in microcosm. The soul of this hedonistic tanner-merchant-speculator-epigrammatist was a complex affair; despite his absolute lack of formal education, he kept his countrymen guessing about his character in his own generation and their descendants are guessing still. He hoaxed his business competitors—"speklelaters [that] swarmed like hell houns"—into believing that he was a harmless dunce, and then fleeced them under their very noses; it is probable that he made a fortune by selling Bibles to the West Indians who were induced to buy the Holy Book by his threat that "all of them must have one bibel in Every familey, or if not thay would goue to hell"; he wrote a book, "A Pickle for the Knowing Ones," in order "to learn myself to write and spell which I never knew how. . . . Clear Nature has been my school master," and thus produced a volume that, for compact, energetic expression of a many-sided nature, is almost without a peer. Worst of all, he mocked at all the cherished rigidities of the New England conscience. "If I am not converted, there is not anyone converted as I think," he wrote in 1795; "I have been more than twenty years converted (I am not joking about it) ever since I got me a housekeeper." In less than two years the pious devotee had been mercilessly thrashed twice, and forced to flee the neighborhood, for trying to convert other men's housekeepers. Nor was his impression of church activities very edifying. This is his description of one sermon: "Less pray, & so went on, fire, fire, & brimstone & grunting & sithing, and tried to cry & snifel & blow the sconks horn, & sum of the old fules & yung fules sot to crying. I tuck my hat and went out."

In his old age the diverting paranoiac became ever more eccentric. He styled himself "Lord" Timothy Dexter who was "First in the East, First in the West, and the Greatest Philosopher in the Western World"; he immortalized a rascally local bard by making him his "Poet Lauriet" and crowning him with parsley leaves; he surrounded his palatial house with gaudy wooden statues of "Doctor franklin, John hen Cock and Mr. hamelton and Rouffous king and John Jea . . . one younecorne, one Dogg, Addam and Eave in the Garden—one horse." Finally he built himself a tomb with a "Temple of Reason," twelve feet square and having 158 panes of glass, on top of it, and ordered a special coffin behind which he proudly trudged as it was carried through the streets on a wheelbarrow to the tomb. The casket had "nobel trimmings, uncommon Lock, so I can take the kee in side, and have fier works in the toume, pipes & tobacker & A speaking trumpet, and a bibel to read and sum good songs." Then, capping the climax, he had a "mock founnel" which was accompanied by "very much criing"; but when it was over he soundly thumped his wife because she had not wept at all. Not many years later, when the genuine funeral of "I-I-me T Dexter" was held, his righteous townsmen refused to entomb him in his beloved pagan mausoleum but buried him in plain New England soil.

This book, in short, adds further and very pointed information to the slowly growing fact that the New England of the eighteenth century occasionally combined the decadence of the Deistic French Revolution with some Babylonian excesses all its own. Lord Timothy Dexter, one suspects, would not be too comfortable even in the present enlightened and unbigoted age.

Without Benefit of Rules

Public Utilities and the Law. By William M. Wherry, Jr. The Writers Publishing Company, Inc.

THIS book is written by a public utility lawyer primarily for the guidance of public utility executives in their opposition to public control. In the author's own words, "the work is intended as an exposition, made as simple as possible, of the rights of public utility companies to make and obtain profitable rates for their services without State interference." Another purpose of the book, quite obvious to the reader, but not quite so frankly expressed, is to promote the employment of the author and other experts by public utility companies to prepare for and handle their rate cases. "At the very outset of a movement to make a new rate," says Mr. Wherry, "it is important that a company obtain competent and trained legal advice, so that it may know just what issues are likely to be involved, and what preparation, from the legal point of view, may be necessary." And further on he adds: "The need for expert services in rate matters cannot be emphasized too strongly. Another thing worth remembering is that no treatise can take the place of the actual services of an expert."

Mr. Wherry's book is very readable; it is a clever exposition of the law from the standpoint of the right and power of the utilities to escape the restrictions of regulation. It has been charged that the public utilities, though nominally clamoring for state regulation, never have accepted public regulation in good faith and never cease their efforts to thwart it. Mr. Wherry's book may be accepted as one proof of this charge. He stresses, first, the theory that public utility property, though devoted to public use, is still private property, and on this basis he is able to reason away all substantial legal restrictions upon the freedom of its owners to use it as they see fit. "Now, an owner of a public utility property," says he, "has a right to charge for the use of that property whatever pleases him, so long as his charges are not so high or unreasonable as to prevent the proper 'use and enjoyment' of the facilities he has dedicated to the public service." In other words, the utilities have the right to charge what the traffic will bear, and the state has no right to interfere with them. The author admits that "the rate charged by a company must not exceed the value of the service which it renders to the community"; but he assumes that a service is always worth more than its cost. He says: "A company has a right to charge any rate so long as it is not unjust and unreasonable. A reasonable rate is one which divides the spread between the cost of producing or selling what is produced and its value to the person who buys it. The service of any public utility to anyone of its consumers is vastly more valuable than the mere cost of furnishing it." And there you are. Exit public regulation except as a means of enabling the companies to charge any rate up to what the traffic will bear, without interference.

Almost Human. By Robert M. Yerkes. The Century Company. $3.

MR. YERKES has written an engaging story of what is probably the most interesting collection of pets in the world, the ape colony in Havana. On the beautiful estate of Madame Abreu nearly eighty primates are assembled—marmosets, tamarins, night-monkeys, squirrel monkeys, titi monkeys, howlers, capuchins (the favorite of the organ-grinder), macaques, mangabeys, baboons, and mandrills. Most interesting to the psychologists invited in 1924 to observe this colony were the three orang-utans, the many adult and adolescent chimpanzees, and the female gibbon. Only the gorilla is missing and this gap will probably be filled, since the experience of Miss Alyse Cunningham has shown that with intelligent feeding, hygiene, and companionship it is possible, even though difficult, to keep young gorillas in good condition. The question of mental hygiene for apes is raised by Mr. Yerkes's suggestion that difficulties in rearing the primates may be due quite as much to failure to supply suitable companionship, either animal or human, as to improper feeding or exposure to disease.

The purpose of "Almost Human" is to furnish an accurate report of this strange colony about which we have been hearing for some time and to afford the layman an orientation in the world of scientific research among the primates. Despite the unquestioned authority of Mr. Yerkes, the value of the book to science is, in the nature of the case, distinctly minor. The ape colony of Madame Abreu offers the finest possible opportunity for controlled experimentation—an opportunity unparalleled for increasing the sum total of human knowledge regarding the anthropoids; but this opportunity has been largely neglected or ignored. Madame Abreu's conclusions regarding the mental capacities and personality traits of her pets are important only where they serve to confirm the findings of such investigators as Köhler and Yerkes. Her notions regarding the souls of the animals and their capacity to perceive the departing ghosts of other apes might easily have been made ridiculous; Mr. Yerkes has shown a fine discretion in his method of presenting such naivetes.

The most remarkable achievement of the colony is the rearing of Anuma, the first chimpanzee born in captivity in the New World who survived for longer than a few weeks. Anuma has not only survived but flourished to the age of ten. As he is rapidly reaching maturity the center of interest is shifting from him to his half-sister Lita, now three years old. The marked differences in personality and behavior between Anuma and his father suggest the important possibility that domestication has actually taken place, and Anuma's future as an adult chimpanzee becomes actually more important than his past. The interesting fact that so active and intelligent an animal as the chimpanzee has never been put to work, despite a capacity rated sometimes as high as that of a seven-year-old child, makes the future of Anuma and Lita of further significance, for if the ape is capable of domestication it would seem he should also be capable of training along lines of usefulness.

The primary importance of the primates, however, will probably always lie in their points of resemblance to human beings. Except for a well-developed language the great apes manifest practically all of the so-called human characteristics, and it is possible that with the basis already laid of a variety of meaningful cries the development of language among the apes has only waited upon a life requiring such development. Madame Abreu's colony is particularly useful in establishing the importance of individual differences among the apes, so that we now see that conclusions must be based upon a large number of studies rather than upon isolated instances. While her views regarding the mental life of her pets have the value only of natural history her development of methods of care and treatment under which such varieties of apes live and flourish is entitled to a most respectful consideration, and it is interesting that she has found a vegetarian diet adequate to keep the anthropoids in perfect health and to enable them to breed and rear young successfully. Her colony from this standpoint represents an achievement of the first rank, and it is unfortunate indeed that the further step has not been taken of introducing a psychological laboratory into the center of this ape world.

Mr. Yerkes devotes a final chapter to the possibilities of research among the primates for the sake of biological, medical, and educational knowledge which may later be applied to human beings; and he concludes that the primates have a strategic value for psychological inquiry, declaring that "of all living creatures they are the most promising material for the psychologist, aside from his fellow-beings. And where the fellow-beings refuse to lead or follow, where experimentation is unjust or otherwise impracticable, the infra-human primate is supreme. It is far worse than careless to ignore or neglect our opportunities; it is wholly inexcusable." It is to be hoped that provision may yet be made for utilizing in a more thorough degree the opportunity presented by the Cuban colony.

Caravan. By Witter Bynner. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

THE revival of poetry in America about twelve years ago was not accompanied by a conscious reorganization of critical thought. There have been good critics in isolation and they have formed a partial though not very lucid taste for as much of the good poetry as is not popularly too difficult. But the depraved poetic taste that ruled before the war has not been radically corrected: one may suppose that, the novel properties of the "new poetry" having become a commodity for trade and dimmed considerably, we are returning complacently to our accustomed poetic oblivion in which poetry out of the great traditions of style becomes incomprehensible and, after a few gratuitous measures, suffocates.

Our chief deficiency has been the lack of a critic who might have done for the last ten years of American poetry what Gourmont did for symbolism. Mr. Untermeyer has been the harbinger of fashion; he was never the apologist. Through successive revisions of his critical note on T. S. Eliot, for example, in successive editions of "Modern American Poetry," he has, under pressure of what one must take to be opinion, elevated Mr. Eliot to the canon—the same canon, however, in which the verse of W. R. Benét belongs. Marianne Moore is still the darling of a cult. Mr. Robinson, after thirty-one years, has "Collected Poems" and two Pulitzer prizes; but it would be difficult to prove that criticism has derived a conscience from certain distinguished qualities of his art. In Mr. Robinson alone we would be possessed of much. We have a little more. Yet our good poetry has not instructed criticism sufficiently to make impossible the appearance of much that is habitually mediocre, dully trivial, or simply bad.

For only on this or a like supposition can one account for the publication of these four volumes. It would be the office of criticism, ideally, in a regime supporting a literary dictatorship, to control the current of ideas so rigorously that they would be cut off at their inception; a literary dictatorship is, of course, a doubtful good. Failing often to provide for genius, it eliminates on principles of taste the useless uncreative production deficient in that category. And it would be of some negative use, at least, when the criticism of poetry, seldom now more than an extension of reviewing, does not care to interfere with business, with commodities for trade.

However, one is perplexed by the fact that Mr. Edman's and Mr. Anderson's books are by no means articles of commerce. It is interesting that Mr. Edman is well-known as a philosopher; and that, better known than Mr. Edman, Mr. Anderson is a successful dramatist. Mr. Benét, author of some engaging ballads, has collected, in "Tiger Joy," too much of the decoration he obviously wrote as articles of commerce for the popular monthlies.

Mr. Bynner has deservedly been a leading figure in American poetry: he has produced some good lyrics. His disastrous facility is a commonplace. It betrays an intelligent person like Mr. Bynner into an unreadable dulness of repetition, and often into false intensities—Theology, for instance, in this volume—that are bathos. "Caravan" will not obscure Mr. Bynner's reputation, but it offers little to sustain it.

Konrad Bercovici

Iliana. By Konrad Bercovici. Boni and Liveright. $2.
The Marriage Guest. By Konrad Bercovici. Boni and Liveright. $2.

ONLY two of the tales in "Iliana," Seed and Wisdom of Youth, are excellent. In Wisdom of Youth the external world of snow and wind and rain, of winter and spring, of plowing and harvesting in Rumania is all quite perfectly a part of the credible story of young George as he fights to keep his family simple and to save them from the absurdity and the tragedy of aping a French sophistication. In Seed a horse race is presented as thrillingly as the wrestling match was presented in Mr. Bercovici's finest story, Ghitza. But Muzio is thinly sentimental, unpleasantly artificial. The so-called passion is too unconvincing to scorch a single printed word. In Revenge, with the coming to life of the centuries-old young Greek Aristides Simonides, there is absurd characterization. Before the young man's father was killed by a political enemy the young man couldn't even get excited about the recovery of his favorite wooden cigarette-holder which he had lost on the train to Marseilles. "In less than a minute he had changed from a tired boy into a passionate man." And a lot more about this revenge which has finally given him something real and earnest to live for. The enemy, who he hopes will be a tiger, turns out to be a groveling old imbecile; and the blow is so staggering to young Simonides's pure Greek ego that he commits suicide. Muzio and Revenge are fairly representative of the other stories in the volume.

Mr. Bercovici is successful only when he writes of his own Rumania and his gipsies. It was bad judgment for him to venture in his latest book, "The Marriage Guest," into the

The American Hebrew:
"What is the significance of this book, its salient characteristics? Perhaps its absolute freedom from cant, its plain speaking. So outspoken is Mr. Roth in voicing his sentiments that one may question the advisability of having such a book as his too promiscuously circulated. So much of it is open to misconstruction; so many passages in it could be lifted to serve as material for anti-Jewish propaganda."

Rochester Herald:
"Mr. Roth has executed a curious tour de force, caustic and brilliant, and which, improperly digested, may furnish nourishment for many a bitter and empty argument. . . . field of American life, where he must bear comparison with Dreiser and with Sherwood Anderson—to whom, by what seems a mistaken piety, he has dedicated this novel.

"The Marriage Guest" is the story of three generations of a German family in New York from about 1890 to the present time. They begin in the East Side; you leave them in their bourgeois affluence on Riverside Drive. The story purports to deal with their problems; and most of the book does talk about them. Greta Zwenge, urged by her ambitious mother, jilts the poor musician Karl Bleicher, whom she loves, for the flashy George Gewurtz. George, you are told, is very brutal to Greta at the consummation of their marriage. Life after that is possible for Greta only in so far as she can impose upon her husband the image of Karl. When the daughter Karolin is born she is, in the mother's vivid fantasy, Karl Bleicher's child. Karolin at nineteen is engaged to Stanley Mitchell (Mayflower stock), an impecunious young musician. She loves him, but she rather hard-headedly gives him up when the distinguished Karl Bleicher returns to New York and falls in love with her. What Karl loves in the girl is the image of the mother whom he had lost so many years before. The mother opposes the marriage. In a final showdown Greta makes the great confession, stating that Karolin is Karl's daughter and that for them to marry would be—incest. One is really shocked at this speech because, from what has been so definitively and so often stated about Greta's cloistered life, one is amazed to find that she knew the meaning of the word.

No character in "The Marriage Guest" moves from any inner necessity that life in a character imposes. One can easily visualize Greta on the screen or moving among the sets at Hollywood; otherwise she has little relation to life. No. In Mr. Dreiser's book one is interested in everything that Jennie Gerhardt does or says. Mr. Bercovici never succeeds, as Mr. Dreiser so often does, in getting his characters started and then in withdrawing to let them live out their own lives.

A few sentences taken from "The Marriage Guest" will give the quality: "His large, fleshy mouth covered her small lips with a powerful suction, as if she were a deep fountain and he a very thirsty man." "He had asked her to lie down and rest. He had trapped her." Later: "She was merely a tool in his hand, now. What cared he what happened to her?" Still later: "'I married you. And then you remember what you did the first morning we were in the hotel in Albany. O God!' she yelled."

ANGUS BURRELL

The Autobiography of Mother Jones. Chicago: Charles Kerr and Company. $1.50.

IT was in the early industrial struggles of America that Mother Jones, born in Cork, Ireland, found her place as organizer and speaker. Her autobiography is a record of courage and fearlessness. Entering the labor movement when she was almost fifty years of age, she fought the battles of a nascent organization for almost forty years. Hers was a fighting personality endowed with strong loves and hates, and thriving on conflicts.

The frontier days of American industry were productive of many such personalities. They looked upon the aggrandizements of industry as something which they must check or encourage, depending upon which side of the Labor-Capital fence they happened to be. The labor movement of the '70s and '80s shared this individualistic ideology. To a person like Mother Jones the mortal enemy of Labor was Capital, concretely incorporated in the "boss"—not the "capitalistic system" or the sprawling corporation of stockholders and investors free from responsibility for the labor policy of the industry. Such animistic concepts called for leaders and organizers to exhort, arouse, and inspire with a religious zeal those who were getting the short end of the rope in the merciless race for wealth. There was need for the wit and the slashing tongue of a Mother Jones.

Clarence Darrow, in his preface, says that Mother Jones never had the time or the education to study the philosophy of the movements which she espoused. If intellect rather than intuition and impulse had been the guiding force of Mother Jones she might have interpreted the role she played with greater vision and understanding. She would have recognized the value of the tactical policies of the United Mine Workers when that organization achieved a degree of permanency and strength. She would have realized that a labor movement cannot be built by a single hand. But also she might never have been able to lead army after army of miners' wives, beating tin pans, carrying mops and brooms, and routing the scabs out of the mines. She might never have been able to lead an army of little children out of the textile mills into the great highway of public opinion in protest against child labor. She probably would not have been able to lash thousands of miners into a fury of action against the oppression of mine operators. Neither would she have been able to ford the icy waters of a mountain creek in order to hold a meeting with striking miners in a place not owned by the company. These are acts which do not come from an understanding of a philosophy. They can only be accomplished by a colossal faith.

Mother Jones resents the fact that "labor's representatives sit on velvet chairs in conference with labor's oppressors." The labor leader of today is too respectable for her. She does not understand the technique of "business unionism," of union compromises and agreements, of so-called scientific production. She is the frontierswoman of labor, the fighter, the crusader. She is uncomfortable in the established trade union with all its traditions. Subtlety, shrewdness, and business tactics are the attributes necessary in the latter type of union.

Mother Jones belongs to the struggling movement, to the groups fighting to overcome the obstacles of frontiers. The United Mine Workers of America, like many another union, would never have been without the aid of a Mother Jones.

THERESA WOLFSON

Modern Russian Literature. Prince D. S. Mirsky. Oxford University Press. $1.

This little volume in the series called The World's Manuals is in many respects an admirable performance. The author brings to his task a thorough knowledge of his subject, a readable style, and, above all, a fresh viewpoint. Prince Mirsky has the background of a cultivated Russian and the detachment of an outsider. Moreover, his familiarity with the literatures of England and the Continent allows him to speak of Russia's contribution in terms enlightening to his audience. If one is not always in agreement with his aesthetic judgments, one nevertheless generally finds them stimulating. In a succession of concise chapters the author surveys rapidly the novel, the drama, the poets, and even finds room to say a word about the critics and the publicists. The outline begins at the beginning and comes within hailing distance of the present day. The pages dealing with the more recent developments, about which opinion has not crystallized, are less satisfactory than the chapters having to do with Turgenev, Dostoevski, and Tolstoi, and for that reason it is perhaps just as well that the author has omitted to treat the literature of the Soviet period. It is a pity that in a book which has all the makings of a convenient reference work there should be a number of factual errors which could easily have been rectified. Turgenev could not "follow Hegel's philosophical course" in 1838 for the reason that Hegel died in 1831. He met Pauline Garcia not in 1845

The Education of Behavior. By I. B. Saxby. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Paradoxically enough, the objective study of behavior has brought about a revival of interest in the subjective phases of conduct. Meumann and his pupils had almost succeeded in placing psychology on a solid basis of laws and principles when along came Freud with his dazzling theory of the Unconscious. It suddenly dawned upon psychologists that the mind is a most complicated machine responsive in unequal degrees to both heredity and environment; that the individual's reaction to stimuli is at once rational and irrational, predictable and unpredictable, obscure and obvious. Nevertheless, conduct may be modified and regulated. Mr. Saxby expounds this theory of education. He traces the unfolding of personality from the stage of instinctive reaction to that of abstract thinking, assigning to each intermediate stage its proper place in the development of character. He does not attempt to minimize the educator's task; his is not a facile scheme for mechanizing the educative process. He might, indeed, have given the subject less of a forbidding aspect had he not overemphasized the multiplicity of instincts and the stability of complexes. But one must remember that he is an Englishman, and that in England McDougall, Shand, and Trotter are supreme in the realm of social psychology.

Sidelights on Elizabethan Drama. By H. Dugdale Sykes. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

The studies gathered here are all reprints from various periodicals and are already known to scholars. They deal with the problem of the authorship of a considerable number of sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century plays. The papers of most interest to the reader who is not a specialist are those on the much-mooted question of "Timon of Athens" and on the authorship of "Appius and Virginia"—which, it will be remembered, Rupert Brooke took from the canon of John Webster's plays and ascribed to Thomas Heywood and which Mr. Sykes now vindicates as Webster's. Mr. Sykes employs the same methods of literary "connoisseurship" as does the exceedingly prolific and suggestive Mr. J. M. Robertson, but he employs the tests of vocabulary, style, ideas, and the like more cautiously and, having a better sense of the validity of evidence, is not so easily led astray into the fields of improbable conjecture and rash assumption. The paper on the authorship of "The Taming of a Shrew" and "The Famous Victories of Henry V" is a fine illustration of his method and its results.

The Inside Passage to Alaska. By William Watson Woollen. Arthur H. Clark Company. 2 vols. $12.50.

At last we have materials for the understanding of Alaska — a faithful, even ardent description in two fat volumes of just one of its approaches. By the outside passage is meant the dreary Pacific high sea from the Golden Gate or Puget Sound to Unimak Pass in the Aleutian Archipelago and through Bering Sea to Norton Sound, an unagreeable journey of nine to twelve days. But the inside! Here you have real charm constantly sustained for the scenic enthusiast and the nature lover hugging the Canadian mainland and the Alaska panhandle to the Yukon delta and St. Michael's. On the way one skirts the ends of mighty glaciers dubbed off by the sea and may have the rare sight of a great splash of a valley of ice undermined by the tide wash and pitching forward. Those of us who have tried to tell of it all will feel a personal debt to Mr. Woollen.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be considered as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning prize, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

inferred from them; and who therefore bases his judgments on analysis of technique. The term is, then, not inappropriate since it is applied to one who drags in learning where it has no place. For analysis can neither explain, nor therefore justify, the value or charm of a piece of music, or the absence of such value or charm.

An example will make this clear. My pedant will hold that a passage in a d'Indy symphony must be deeply moving since it is written in accordance with "principles" abstracted in this way from emotionally expressive music, i.e., since, for the purpose, the motif is made higher or lower in pitch and compressed or expanded in time with the rise and fall in emotional intensity, and the passage "begins in the comparatively 'dark' key of D flat, but touches in the fourth measure, at the acme of the climax, the brighter D major, whence with the waning emotion it subsides to the original key." The pedantry, it should be noted, lies not in the analysis, which is legitimate and useful for certain purposes, nor obviously in the judgment, which in other cases might be correct, but in the linking of one with the other, which is incorrect, since its technical virtues make the d'Indy passage not moving but, like most of d'Indy's output, only an expertly constructed illustration for his "Cours de Composition Musicale."

One would hardly expect a lover of jazz to indulge in this sort of pedantry, for the technique of jazz is quite primitive and must, if his judgment is guided by it, lead him, as it has led a hostile critic like Daniel Gregory Mason, to a low estimate of its value. But some who, oversophisticated and "fed up" with serious music, have enjoyed jazz by contrast have found apparent and convenient justification for their enjoyment in details of technique here and there which are more sophisticated than the usual and which they have assumed to be the rule and made more of than is allowable. In this way has arisen such a notion as that jazz is characterized by bewildering rhythmic complexity, to which have been attached such very loose notions as that it is the only music of charm or value which Americans can produce, because it is the only music rooted in America and the American temperament, and that it will not only contribute new material to the forms of serious music but produce new forms adapted to its own material.

The pedantry has been carried to its illogical extreme and utterly discredited by Mr. Gilbert Seldes. "Jazz is good," he says, for he may not enjoy it otherwise, "and I propose to summarize some of the known reasons for holding it so"; i.e., since he does enjoy it he must prove it "good." To do so, since he conceives of musical value as correlated with details of technique, he must show that it possesses a sophisticated technique. And since it does not possess such a technique he proceeds as follows.

He describes simple things at such length that through sheer weight of words they appear complicated and extraordinary; following his example one might speak of the effect of groups of four-sixteenths alternately rising and falling in pitch to the accompaniment of staccato quarters, and yet be describing only the effect of a Czerny five-finger exercise. He gives one thing the name of something he likes better, and supports his claims with explanations that are incorrect, examples that are inappropriate, and reasons that do not support his conclusions—obtaining in this fashion dissonance from the slide or smear,* and from syncopation more dissonance (and even polytony) and rhythmic complexities such as "one finds only in

* Thus, to take only this example [illegible] says: "The slide [illegible] to the note which will make an [illegible] chord, the instrument passes through discords." But the very nature of the smear—an infinite gradation of pitch in extremely rapid form—is such as to prevent [illegible] the notes in the chord or out of it, from being heard as distinct; and only a continuous tone can form part of a harmony and be considered as such. In effect the smear is nothing but a melodic embellishment, of a note with definite pitch.

he great masters of serious music." This toppling structure ie buttresses with a liberal and inexpert, when not actually ncorrect, use of technical lingo and with much talk about lusive, debatable qualities like rapidity and cleanness of style of composition. In all this he profits by the ignorance of most of his readers, by the fact that use of technical terms carries with it the unnecessary presumption that the user can correlate term with object correctly and has done so, by an appearance of perfect assurance, and above all by a prose, corresponding to a thought, so unconsecutive that he can contradict himself almost in one sentence without appearing to realize it. All this, however, Mr. Seldes has done only to substantiate notions which he has picked up about him, notions already exaggerated, which, through his lack of the necessary special knowledge, he has succeeded only in distorting and making absurd. What, now, of these notions in their original form?

By rhythmic complexity is meant the shifting from one meter to another; the use of different meters simultaneously, this frequently being an effect of syncopation in one voice when the regular beats in the other are unobtrusive; and above all the varying of the length and style of phrases and of the figuration.

Now, jazz can be defined as music written in the meter of the fox-trot. Its essence, in fact, contrary to the prevailing notion, is not the syncopation in the melody but the steady plunk-plunk-plunk-plunk of the four quarters of the accompaniment in rapid tempo (one reason for the precision of the orchestras and their ability to play without a conductor). It is not the effect of syncopation that is characteristic of jazz, since one finds syncopation in greater abundance and variety in serious music, but the effect of syncopation in the jazz meter and tempo; and actually one can strip away the syncopation and still have "Bambalina," proof that the syncopated melody, like the scoring or the exciting rapid figuration introduced by pianists to fill in the beats, is mere embellishment. On the other hand, take away the plunk-plunk-plunk-plunk and jazz is no longer jazz.

One finds, therefore, no shifting from meter to meter or use of meters simultaneously, with the exception of a rare and necessarily brief interpolation of a figure in triple time. Since the regular beats in the accompaniment are so insistent the effect of the syncopation in the melody is not that of a cross-meter but only one of irregularity in the ordinary meter, the latter being no less four-quarter for being irregular four-quarter, and the beats being, in fact, emphasized by being anticipated. And finally there is lacking the most important source of rhythmic variety in serious music, namely, variation in the length and shape of phrases, with artistic use of figuration. This is so closely correlated with extended structure or form as to be almost identical with it; certainly one cannot have one without the other. Both are, however, almost inconceivable in the jazz meter; and so, according to one's point of view, the rhythmic technique being what it is the form is small, and the form being what it is one finds, for the most part, phrases of the common symmetrical variety consisting of two or four measures with a strong cadence and an oom-pah oom-pah in each measure.

The resulting effect is one of the utmost simplicity, regularity, and rigidity; the effect, that is, of four quarters constantly reiterated, upon which any apparent eccentricity is superimposed and to which it is firmly riveted; and the prevailing notion to the contrary, since one cannot attribute it to what is done in the meter, one must attribute to the meter itself, i.e., to the fact that a dance meter cannot be anything but lively and exhilarating, regardless of how it is treated. It seems correct, therefore, to describe jazz as an art of embellishment, based on a limitation—limitation to one subject matter, the four quarters of the fox-trot measure; and embellishment of this (also limited) by rich, ingenious scoring, by a not unrestrainedly syncopated melody, and more recently by chords borrowed from serious music.

This subject matter of jazz does not seem to lend itself to musical architecture. With a preoccupation with architecture I should expect to see a shifting of emphasis from the essence to its melodic embellishment, and perhaps, as a result, a loss of the specific jazz character. In its treatment the material would, in any case, be governed by the same conditions or limitations as any other musical material—i.e., it could only be modified, or repeated, or followed by something new—and the forms would necessarily be those we know. I do not care to predict; I can only point out that until now the material has not been modified, and the form has been small. The large form characteristic of jazz has been, whatever its title, the potpourri, a series of small forms strung together.

There is, finally, no such thing as a type of music being rooted or alien (if there is such a thing as a national temperament); instead one may speak only of persons being adapted or unadapted to it; and all that composition of a type of music indicates, and requires as a necessary though not sufficient condition, is adaptation to the tradition of previous composition. Whatever the failure of American serious music indicates, it is not the lack of such adaptation. If Americans are less successful in writing serious music than in writing popular music it may be because one is more difficult to write at all than the other, and also because at the present stage of development of each it is more difficult to make a valuable contribution to one than to the other.

Here, lest one infer from all this that I dispute the charm of jazz, I hasten to repeat what the very prevalence of such pedantry tends to obscure, namely, that Professor Mason can no more dispute than Mr. Seldes can establish the value of jazz by such arguments. They will nevertheless attempt to do so, and in general their pedantry, though fallacious, will continue to be prevalent, because it is useful not only to themselves but to others: some of those who formerly feared jazz in public at least, as a sort of scarlet woman of music may now lend their names to a jazz concert without losing their musical respectability. There is something suspicious in the sudden sweet reasonableness of these persons and the rapidity of their conversion; and my guess is that formerly they observed their musical moral standards, like their other moral standards, in true Anglo-American fashion, by allowing themselves to be bored almost to extinction at the public concerts of serious music of which they were the patrons and guarantors, and enjoying [illegible] in private.

Drama

A Religious Farce

THANKS to the comprehensiveness of Shaw's philosophy there is no material which may not be made to serve his purpose. Whatever history has recorded or legend invented impinges somewhere upon the set of ideas which he has developed and can be made to serve as a lesson in that morality which it is his proudest boast to have invented. But there are some heroes who receive less readily than others the Shavian stamp; and so it is that while "The Man of Destiny," which serves as a curtain-raiser to the current Theater Guild production of "Androcles and the Lion" (Klaw Theater), seems relatively forced and unconvincing the latter play is one of the happiest of all its author's efforts. With a little forcing, Napoleon can, like Caesar, be made to seem a baffled and imperfect superman and into his mouth can be put what is perhaps the neatest of all Shaw's summings up of that unconscious hypocrisy which enables the Englishman to further his own ends and call it serving God; but Napoleon is not really a man much after Shaw's heart, and he cannot kindle to him as he kindles when he allows his imagination to play over the legendary hero of early Christianity. With an impish delight he draws the deadly parallel between the attitude of the respectable pagan then and the attitude of the respectable churchman now, but he rises far above mere satire and he mingles mysticism with his buffoonery. Into the mouth of Lavinia the patrician he puts the confession of his highest faith—only God is big enough to make us want to die for Him, but when we know what God is we shall be gods ourselves—and the whole piece throbs with pity and understanding. There is laughter at all that is temporary and accidental, but it is the laughter of one who dares to be irreverent because he knows that irreverence can damage only those things which do not deserve to be revered.

In no other of his plays does Shaw indulge more freely both his satiric gift and his love of boisterous foolery, but in no other does he reveal more clearly his passionate faith. "Androcles" is a religious farce which ends, as a farce should, in a manner which seems wholly inconsequential, but it manages in the course of its action to rise repeatedly and unexpectedly to heights of spiritual drama. Each member of the little group of Christian martyrs has first of all the fate of his own soul to settle; Lavinia transcends the sect with which she has identified herself, Ferrovius loses the battle with his own animal man, and Androcles triumphs by virtue of nothing except the natural gentleness of his character; but the real conflict is the conflict between this group as a whole and the society which surrounds it, between those who have found and those who have lost the sense of something greater than themselves and greater than Rome. Androcles and his companions draw courage from this invisible source and they conquer Caesar without his even knowing that he has been conquered.

The play is, I think, the surest touchstone by which to distinguish the true Shavian from one whose temperament is not really akin to his. Only he could have written it and only those who, like him, find laughter no enemy of the highest exaltation can relish its peculiar flavor. Moreover, the distinction will hold where more than a play is concerned, for it is the distinction between those who recognize religion only by the atmosphere of a church and those who recognize it by its own nature. To find the play merely funny is to prove oneself incapable of even comprehending the passion of the mystic; to find it shocking is to confess that one cannot dissociate the idea of spiritual fervor from that of sanctimonious solemnity.

On the whole the present production is the most thoroughly satisfactory of the three presentations of Shaw plays made recently by the Theater Guild. The settings and costumes designed by Covarrubias are in a vein of delightful extravagance which reflects perfectly the mood of burlesque that characterizes the outward action of the play. The indispensable Henry Travers makes Androcles an absurdly appealing figure; Clare Eames is a most noble Lavinia; and the whole performance is carried off with the sprightliness which the piece demands.

"The Offense," offered for a series of special matinees at the Ritz Theater, is a continuously interesting and at times thrilling story of the effect of an obsession upon its victim. It is well acted by Mary Glynne and Dennis Neilson-Terry, and though obviously too esoteric for commercial success it is the most successful attempt yet seen here to dramatize psychoanalysis. "Me" (Princess Theater) is a somewhat puzzling and not at all convincing drama which deals with the transfer of personality from one person to another. "Twelve Miles Out" (Playhouse) is a violent melodrama of rumrunners and hijackers. Though painfully naive in its intellectual assumptions it seems to raise its audiences to a high pitch of excitement.

Ten Years From To-day

HERE is a good test for a book: what will it be ten years from today?

Will it be a shoddy and forgotten thing, a sad echo of a fleeting past, a mere bound volume—no longer a book?

Or will it be a living reality—a book you read and re-read with increasing delight, a book you instinctively regard as yours, not only a thing to own, but an experience, an adventure you can never forget?

Ten years from today will the book bring you pride or chagrin?

In 1935, where will the book be? On your favorite book-shelf, beside your bed, in your travelling-bag or coat-pocket, a welcome and inevitable companion on the long brown path before you?

Or will it be in the second-hand book-store, the Salvation Army bag, or the dim jumble of discarded things?

TEN years ago books were published which are today meeting this supreme test—"Jean Christophe," "Casuals of The Sea," "The Man Against The Sky," to name but three.

Today, amid the torrential output of the presses, a few such works are being published—books that will be alive in 1935.

With a measured realization of the significance of such a tribute, we are prepared now to name five of our books as being in this category—books that will be as alive ten years from today as they are today:

FRAULEIN ELSE[1]—by ARTHUR SCHNITZLER (translated by Robert A. Simon), because this short novel—the story of an eighteen year old girl, told from her own point of view—is the masterpiece of an acknowledged genius.

THE MAN MENCKEN[2]—by ISAAC GOLDBERG, because this lavishly documented biography of Henry L. Mencken is a distinguished and Boswellian disclosure of an amazing and immensely significant American.

VERDI; A NOVEL OF THE OPERA[3]—by FRANZ WERFEL, because this novel of the opera is a colossal treatment of a colossal theme—the mystery of creative genius—revolving about the clash between Verdi and Wagner, when both were in Venice, one at dusk, the other at perihelion.

YOU WHO HAVE DREAMS[4]—by MAXWELL ANDERSON and POEMS[5]—by IRWIN EDMAN, because authentic and beautiful poetry cannot die.

1. Full cloth, 160 pages, 4¾ x 7½. $2.00.
2. Full cloth, stamped in genuine gold, 352 pages, 5½ x 8¼, special text paper, 27 full page aquatone illustrations, gilt top. $4.00.
3. Full cloth, 427 pages, 5½ x 8¼. $2.50.
4 and 5. Issued in boards, 64 pages, 5½ x 8¼, printed from type, a limited edition of one thousand numbered copies for each book; type distributed. Price $2.00 each.

These books can be obtained from your bookstore or directly from

THE RHINELANDER CASE was decided exactly as it should have been. Judge Morschauser's charge was a model of fairness and the jury came to the only conclusion that the facts could warrant. With every outward aspect of benevolence and dignity, Judge Mills, counsel for young Rhinelander, did his best to win the case on grounds of prejudice. He appealed to the lowest impulses of a bourgeois, male, white jury. He attempted to make it appear that a union was "unnatural" between Rhinelander and a girl who was so nearly white that his young client was supposed to have been unable to detect her trace of color. He emphasized her family's humble circumstances and even dragged into the courtroom an early misstep of her mother. He solemnly insisted upon the essential responsibility of the woman in the case: if she were not scheming and vicious as well as loose she would have resisted the admitted advances of the young man who, even while he made those advances, was presumed to have been both guileless and beguiled. The jury stood out against the seductions of all these forms of prejudice; and the judge helped to make possible a verdict which paid no respect to wealth or social standing or even a white skin. And now, it is to be hoped, a decent separation will immediately be arranged between two people who are already divorced by bitterness and public opinion and the obscene exposure of their private affairs.

THE ANTHRACITE MINERS accepted Governor Pinchot's plan for the settlement of the strike, but the operators returned to their ivory tower. Why? Because the plan contemplated the one thing which the embattled operators will apparently die to prevent—the opening of their books to the light of day. Over their dead bodies must we find the true profits of the industry, its capacity to pay increased wages, its capacity to stand a reduction in prices. The Freylinghuysen legislation was designed to get publicity for the accounting records. The Coal Commission in 1923 made that its primary recommendation. Governor Pinchot's plan rightly treats it as the foundation-stone of a lasting settlement. Until we know what the monopoly is earning, what untold millions those depletion accounts are hiding, all else is wind and foam. How long, Mr. Operator, will your greed keep facts in the dark, and the public in the cold?

THE "HEATHEN CHINEE" turns the other cheek! It was only a few weeks ago that the Director of Public Safety of Cleveland, Edwin D. Barry, baffled by the inability of his police force to solve a tong murder, herded an entire Chinese population to jail. When the murderer finally confessed, the Hip Sing Tong emerged lily-white and immaculate, and proceeded to hold its convention in Cleveland. The meeting was quiet, orderly, and well conducted. The climax came on November 29, when the tong gave a banquet to policemen, judges, lawyers, and newspapermen of the city. Even Mr. Barry received an invitation. He, however, made it plain to reporters that he would not attend. Since the invitations specified "and family," so many wives, cousins, friends, and friends-of-friends responded that there was not room for all the guests in the King Fong restaurant, where the dinner was held. The overflow was taken to another restaurant in taxis furnished by the Hip Sing Tong. Both Chinese and American food was served. Chinese and American orchestras played alternately. Chinese and Americans were the after-dinner speakers. The Chinese beamed with hospitality and good-will. The Americans essayed ponderous compliments and recalled instances where Chinese had surprised them by acting, oddly enough, just like anybody else! All of them carefully avoided mention of Barry's outrage, except to speak in guarded terms of the "late unpleasantness." It remained for old Wong Bowe, a prominent tong leader, to state names, places, and facts. He exonerated Barry handsomely. After all, the raid had reacted to the greater glory of justice and the Hip Sing Tong. It was all for the best, said Wong Bowe.

THE SESSION OF CONGRESS has opened well so far as the Progressives are concerned. Those in the House have refused to be cajoled or bought or frightened into coming back to the reservation and being "good" Republicans again, and young Senator La Follette has been much too wise to fall into the trap vainly set in his sight—he has refused, as did his father, to enter the Republican caucus. Therefore war to the knife is on, with such dire punishment as Speaker Longworth and Senator Butler can mete out. That is exactly what we had hoped for. We want the rift in the party to continue. With the Democrats destitute of principle and leadership, this handful of Progressives constitute the only effective opposition in Congress. They can at least keep alive the spirit of revolt and the spirit of progress; if they were not there we should hardly hear a voice of protest against the deliberate turning over of the country to big business. To further that purpose the Longworth machine in the House has reverted practically to the Cannon rules by increasing the 150 signatures necessary to take a bill from a committee and bring it before the House to 218, an exact majority. This means "democratic government" in the House by the dominating few who operate the steam-roller. As for Mr. Coolidge, his promised fiery denunciation of the Western farmer-radicals turns out to be a tame affair. He had the pleasure of proving to his own satisfaction how completely the tariff protects the farmer, but he made one serious slip for a protectionist. He admitted that the domestic price is raised by the tariff on imports, and thereby he gave the whole tariff graft away.

MR. GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, has followed up his new wage policy with a speech to engineers. It is an important speech. He has told the Taylor Society and the management division of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers that labor is eager to cooperate with management in eliminating waste. The sorts of waste which labor is especially interested in reducing are unemployment, wide price fluctuations, lack of standardization, unsanitary working conditions, accident hazards, lack of continuity in employment. Mr. Green does not believe that this cooperation and assistance can be brought about through the medium of company unions. Such trained seals have no initiative, no will of their own. There is no meeting of minds, and true cooperation becomes impossible. Neither does Mr. Green withdraw labor's opposition to the alleged elimination of waste through excessive speeding up. The piece-work program of the early school of scientific management was a carrot in front of the donkey's nose. It has had its day, and no cooperation is possible on such a basis. So far, so good. But what made the speech important was that Mr. Green appealed not to the owners of industry but straight to the technical managers. "Financial changes have taken place, until now through the diversified ownership of corporations, management control has supplanted personal-ownership control." He proposes an alliance between those who between them operate industry—the worker and the technician.

WE ARE GLAD OF IT—glad and not greatly surprised to learn that quadrupling the postal rate on newspapers and periodicals mailed by individuals (meaning you, gentle reader) has resulted in an actual shrinkage in receipts from that source, although the purpose was, by increasing revenue, to help to meet higher salaries. It was obvious at a glance that the [illegible] rates fixed at the last session of Congress were, in general, ill-considered and unjust, but sticking out like a sore thumb among the rest was the action whereby the rest of mailing periodicals, although [illegible] for publication, was [illegible] of one cent for four ounces to a charge of two cents for every two ounces. Thus a reader of The Nation who a year ago could mail an ordinary thirty-two page issue to a friend for one cent now has to pay four cents. Since this extraordinary increase has resulted in a loss of revenue, Postmaster General New has decided to recommend that the present rate be reduced by one-half. That will still leave it twice as high as before, but some increase is not unreasonable. Experience so far indicates that the recent postal increases as a whole will give added revenues of about $32,000,000 a year, or not quite half of the amount added to the pay roll. Congress will have to tackle the postal rates again this winter, and we hope will make a better job of it than last time.

HAITI IS CARRYING ON. Ten years ago, while Europe was engrossed in the World War, the United States took advantage of an uprising to land troops in the republic, although neither foreign lives nor property was endangered. A President of our choosing and a treaty by which Haiti surrendered much of her sovereignty were forced upon the people, and in 1917 a new constitution which Franklin D. Roosevelt, then Assistant Secretary of the Navy, has boasted he himself wrote was presented for adoption. When the Legislature refused to accept it, that body was dissolved and Haiti has since been under American military rule with a certain number of native puppets as window-dressing. Even the Roosevelt constitution provides for the election of a legislature every other year, but the American occupation, violating its own instrument, has denied the right. When the term of Puppet-President Dartiguenave expired in 1922 our military dictators, acting under some exceedingly doubtful "transitory provisions" of the Roosevelt constitution, had their hand-picked Council of State elect a successor in Louis Borno. His term expires next year and a legislature to choose his successor should be elected on January 10. Puppet-President Borno has refused to call such an election, but the Patriotic Union is urging voters to go to the polls (which are to be open for the selection of some minor officials) and cast ballots for a new legislature anyhow. In retaliation the representatives of American democracy have again clapped into jail Jolibois, the editor of the Courrier Haitien, and have seized his printing plant. The spirit of the Haitians is splendid. If they can keep up the fight, we of the United States will recognize some day that we have been guilty of grand larceny and will demand that the receivers of the loot disgorge.

THE MATTEOTTI TRIAL will not take place until January; meanwhile the cheerful farce continues. All but the five presumable assassins have been released, including Cesare Rossi, Giovanni Marinelli, and Filippo Filippelli, who by their own confessions or that of others actively implicated were not without foreknowledge of the plot. At the same time a most extraordinary set of findings has just been issued by the Court of Public Prosecutions. Exonerating everyone concerned in the matter of "premeditated murder," the court takes pains to explain why it was impossible for Matteotti's death to have been anything but accidental. In the first place, Matteotti was not an important figure in the Socialist Party and no one would ever have thought of murdering him; he was not murdered in order to gain possession of certain secret documents, because all witnesses have combined to testify that the documents never existed; he was kidnapped in broad daylight under the most public circumstances, which would indubitably indicate that nothing so violent as murder was contemplated; he was murdered a considerable distance from the scene of the kidnapping, and it would obviously have been simpler, if murder had been planned in the first place, to do away with him on the spot; finally, a strong chain was found in the possession of one of the conspirators, which of course proves that nothing like murder was ever intended. The court, therefore, is happy to release all but the five unfortunates who inadvertently did the Socialist deputy to death. Since the unlucky Matteotti had the bad taste to engage in a struggle with them in which he was killed, it is not quite possible to charge them only with the crime of kidnapping. But sufficient thought on the part of the court will doubtless discover that murder with intent to kidnap is, after all, only a minor offense, and the case will be closed pleasantly for everyone.

A COMPANY CALLED British Pictures has announced plans for the establishment of a large motion-picture studio near London, and thus offers the latest of many proposals for the development of the languishing film industry of Great Britain. For a number of years the vision of possible profits has made more acute the patriotic fear lest English audiences should be completely Americanized through the cinema, and a law requiring all theaters to exhibit a certain number of British films has been seriously considered. Yet in spite of all efforts British pictures have never been either good enough or numerous enough to count for anything. Meanwhile America, far from having any similar cause for worry, is faced with the possibility of seeing the theater itself become merely an appendage to this too prosperous industry. William Fox, president of the Fox Film Company, has undertaken to finance five New York theatrical producers merely in order to secure the picture rights to such plays as attain sufficient popular success to make them promising film ventures. Since any dramatic production must be completely rewritten before it is filmed, the only advantage to be gained by having it performed as a play is the publicity and prestige which it receives. Thus Mr. Fox's action is essentially nothing more than an attempt to reduce the New York theater to the position of an advertising medium for the movies.

IN THIS ERA of Calvin Coolidge it is worth more than passing notice that the League for Industrial Democracy is getting ready to celebrate its twentieth birthday. It may well feel proud that it has survived the war and post-war changes in American thought and is today stronger and more active than ever before. To be sure, in the course of these twenty years the league has changed its name and somewhat altered its scope. But it has always kept the line of historic continuity. Beginning in 1905 as the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, under the auspices of such men as Jack London, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, and Upton Sinclair, it has steadily kept before itself its educational mission in our colleges. Last year its officers spoke in some 142 colleges and universities scattered all over the United States. It was the father of the recently formed American Committee on Justice to China and has set up under its auspices a working Committee on Coal and Super Power which issued the important proposals for permanent peace in the coal fields outlined in our last issue [page 641]. The man more responsible than any other for these years of successful activity is Harry W. Laidler, who has been connected with the society from the start. He will preside at the birthday dinner on December 30, when twenty years of social pioneering will be celebrated by the friends of the league and of the cause of industrial freedom.

COLLEGE PUBLICATIONS are usually as unsatisfactory to the students who try to read them as they are to all adult outsiders. The conservatism of youth is nowhere more depressing than it is on campuses where undergraduate editors never, apparently, so much as try to avoid the traditional extremes on the one hand of the sickly-aesthetics literary monthly and on the other hand of the athletic daily designed for adolescent Babbitts. Hence the distinction of a new publication at the University of Wisconsin edited by John Schindler and Carl Rakosi. The Issue will appear monthly, but it has utterly cast off the form of the conventional college monthly devoted, as one of the editorials in the first number puts it, "solely to the moon, stars, flowers, love, and the general frustrations of the English Department." It looks like a daily, yet in turn it has cast off the "naughty-naughty geniality" of the typical campus newspaper, and it puts a positive taboo upon such subjects as football, fraternities, and petting. The remarkable thing about the Issue, if it keeps up, will be its combination of critical seriousness and lively intelligence. This first number, being concerned in the main with university policies, really bites into its subject with articles on The Wisconsin Idea, The Wisconsin Plan, President Frank, and—by corollary—Progressivism in Politics. Extraordinarily able book reviews round out a number dedicated on the whole to "something more than the ordinary run of college puns and infantile sentiments." We wish the Issue all success; and we sincerely hope that we do not miss its forthcoming article on Magazines One Need Not Read.

IN ORDER THAT our readers may have a breath of the bracing, intellectual air that pervades American colleges, we quote the following editorial from the Daily Maroon of the University of Chicago for October 14:

> The rushing of high-school athletes for the university is now the business of the Intramural Department. . . .
> This committee is a regularly organized activity, maintaining offices [illegible] year round. Its work is necessary if the university is to maintain its present position in intercollegiate athletics. Through its work, which last year was concentrated into the [illegible] days of the interscholastic meets, many promising high-school boys who would normally have gone to their State universities were induced to come here.
> The new division of responsibility, coupled with the new continuous policy of the Athletic Department, will make for far greater efficiency than ever before and for a diversion of high-school athletes from the whole nation. We lose many men every year who might bring credit to us through the naturally stronger appeal of the State universities. We are compelled to counteract this attraction by intensive though rigidly honorable methods. Since this is so, we must use the best tactics possible in assembling athletes from the whole country.

Noble work! Three cheers for the professional athletics which college students fondly imagine are amateur! Long live higher education!

Militarizing America's Youth

WHAT happened in the Great War, fought ostensibly to end war, to turn American college campuses into parade grounds? What facts in the present situation lead us to trust for the preservation of peace to the military training of high-school boys? It is time that we Americans should face these questions squarely and ask ourselves where we are going.

The War Department thinks it knows. It is using military training in high schools, colleges, and summer camps as the nearest thing it can get to universal military training and service. In General Pershing's language it is popularizing "by all available methods" the "preparation for military service." These methods include compulsion in some 197 secondary schools and colleges wherever complaisant trustees can be found to enforce it. They include all sorts of rewards and blandishments from cash to glory where compulsion as yet is not or cannot be applied. They include also plain misrepresentation. Thus American fathers and mothers are assured by the preface of the Junior Reserve Officers' Training Corps Manual: "The purpose of this book is not to make soldiers out of your boys but to develop them physically, morally, and mentally into the best type of citizens, capable of defending our flag should anything arise." The army officers are officially instructed: "Always remember that men are the material being trained and molded for the work of battle. . . . They are being trained to be soldiers." And the students are told: "Success in battle, whether attack or defense, is the aim of all military training."

Such are some of the facts that have been brought out in the recent revolt of the students in colleges as far apart as the University of Washington and the College of the City of New York against compulsory military training. These revolts are encouraging; they have nowhere been crushed by temporary defeat, but only in Pomona and the University of Wisconsin have the students won. And in the high schools there has been no shadow of revolt. In short, the problem is for the nation; not alone for the students.

So much is made clear by the timely appearance and wide circulation of Winthrop D. Lane's pamphlet on "Military Training in Schools and Colleges," with a foreword signed by more than fifty influential Americans including four United States Senators. Mr. Lane's quiet, carefully documented statement of fact ought to undermine the foundations of the elaborate structure of militarism which is rising with dangerous rapidity.

We have been told, even by liberals, that it is folly to speak of the R. O. T. C. in our colleges as contributing to the "structure of militarism." It promotes little enthusiasm for drill and less for war. The officers in charge are of high caliber. The Daily Princetonian in commending the fight of the College of the City of New York against compulsion spoke in the highest praise of the quality of leadership in the elective training course at Princeton. Now all these things may be true without proving that military training is innocuous. Military drill has never in any land made the average man like war; it has made him accept it. And that is what counts. The man who has taken military science even under compulsion as part of the price of his education, still more the man who has taken it for money or honor, has given hostages to the future. He is part of a system which in an emergency he cannot desert without some feeling of disloyalty. That is what the officers in charge know and that is the result they seek. Moreover, too many of them not merely teach a general acceptance of war and the warrior's interpretation of history; they point to specific possible enemies—usually Japan—and thereby directly menace peace. We happen to know a corps commander in charge of R. O. T. C. work in an important area. He is an officer and a gentleman who has risen by hard work. He confided to some of his friends that if only the Great War had lasted a little longer he would have been a brigadier general. By personal preference he desires peace, not war. But he simply cannot imagine a world without war. He honestly loves the army. He is infinitely credulous concerning all the "menaces," red and yellow, domestic and foreign, which bring such fearsome thrills to the National Security League.

Such is militarism whether in Prussia, France, or America. Let it continue to march hand in hand with American economic imperialism and this our country will become by reason of its very might the worst obstacle to the peace of the world. And in this process of militarization, as Mr. Lane points out, the universities may find that by giving over to the War Department such large areas of academic life to control they are introducing an element possibly more dangerous to academic freedom than ecclesiasticism or big business.

Now this situation which has stolen upon the people more or less unawares is by no means irremediable. That is proved by the fight in the colleges and by the weight of some of the signatures indorsing Mr. Lane's pamphlet. The most obvious objectives are (1) the entire abolition of military training in secondary schools where by the universal agreement of psychologists and educators it does not belong; and (2) the abolition of compulsion in the colleges. The former is in the hands of boards of education; the latter of boards of trustees and regents. It would be a great gain if both these ends could be obtained.

But the real remedy for the militarizing of our most ambitious youth goes deeper. It is not enough that students should not be compelled to take military training; they should not be bribed or cajoled into it. It is high time for Congress to amend the law and stop the appropriations which subvert our institutions of learning from their proper function of education for peace. Tribes and nations since history began have sought safety by sacrificing the bright years of youth, its hopes and dreams, to war or preparation for war. And their sacrifices have been in vain. It is for our colleges to discover a better and nobler way of happiness and safety. To ask them, of all places, to become temples of a militarist cult, dedicated to the god of battles—this is to ask of them a betrayal of their very souls. For they exist to woo the young man to love of science and art, beauty and truth. These are not purely national; they are not born of war; they are stifled by the discipline of the martinet. They spring from the peaceful intercourse of peoples and the commerce of great minds; they grow strong only in the free air of fearless inquiry. In their increase is our hope. It is a hope not found in any military manual.

The Civilian Aircraft Problem

So far as civilian flying is concerned, we agree with the recommendations of the special commission appointed by President Coolidge to deal with aircraft problems. The Morrow commission does not suggest direct subsidies, but does urge the establishment of a bureau of air navigation under an additional assistant secretary of commerce, the progressive extension of the air-mail service, preferably by contract, and additional airways and air-navigation facilities, including adequate weather reports. In addition, the Morrow board advises that governmental research in aeronautic science be actively continued and that the industry be aided by the adoption of a policy of continuity in orders and a standard rate of replacement, only those manufacturing companies to be utilized which maintain adequate engineering staffs.

So far, so good. If the Government really sets itself to the task of encouraging civilian flying we ought to be able to make some progress. But the fact is that today we lag incredibly behind other countries, yet our public is calmly assured that in material and personnel we are keeping up with the great advances abroad. This we deny. There is not a single commercial passenger line in service in America today. All over Europe there are well-established lines with as regular departures and arrivals as any railroad trains, and with a minimum of fatalities. Months ago the German-Russian Air Travel Company celebrated the completion of flights between Moscow and Königsberg which totaled 1,000,000 kilometers. There is a daily service between the cities. There are some twenty daily airplane departures from Hamburg over regularly established routes, and some of these serve not merely the largest cities of Germany but comparatively small ones as well. In England there are four commercial air routes, the most important being those between London and Paris and London and Cologne. The problem is a difficult one because of the seasonal gales over the Channel and the North Sea, and yet there, too, the accidents are few, although they are bad enough when they occur. We have no single airplane in America comparable to one which the Imperial Airways is shortly to put in service on the London-Paris route. This machine weighs eight tons and is fitted with three engines which develop 1,200 horse-power. With only two engines running the airplane can make ninety-five miles an hour; with two out of commission it can still keep going. The ventilation is electrically controlled and the "drumming," which is so sickening to many passengers, is, it is claimed, entirely eliminated. This company alone carried 541 tons of freight in 1924; it will make 5,000 flights in 1925.

In view of these achievements it seems really incredible that we have no lines in service between Boston, New York, and Washington and between New York and Chicago. This is the more difficult to understand because, as the Hoover Committee on Civil Aviation which made its report on November 4, last, declares: "Topographical and meteorological conditions in the United States are in general favorable to air navigation." This Hoover committee also went on record as being strongly opposed to direct governmental subsidy. With that policy we are in hearty accord, but the committee seems justified in recommending that the Government provide funds for the design and construction by private industry of special aircraft and equipment under the joint direction of the executive heads of all departments concerned. The Government might also arrange with private individuals to offer prizes and bonuses for the best type of commercial airplane and for the company successfully completing the first one hundred commercial flights. We confess that we cannot understand the failure of American initiative and enterprise to enter this field. From time to time we hear rumors of the establishment of this or that company, as, for instance, one headed by the former Assistant Secretary of War, Benedict Crowell, the promise being that this organization would have German airships in service for night flights between New York and Chicago by the spring of 1926. The unfortunate catastrophe to the Shenandoah would probably make the establishment of such a service extraordinarily difficult; yet it is possible if only competent and experienced men, irrespective of nationality, be employed.

The Morrow commission, so far as civil aviation is concerned, is almost entirely of the same view as the Hoover committee. With these two bodies making virtually similar recommendations, Congress is in a position to act upon a basis of fact. But even the establishment of an assistant secretaryship of commerce will not do much. Commercial aviation will be established here only when business men can be interested in taking it up and developing it precisely as they did the automobile. That time ought not to be far distant.

A Literary Executioner

"IF a poem have genius," said Dryden in 1681, "it will force its own reception in the world; for there is a sweetness in good verse which tickles even while it hurts; and no man can be heartily angry with him who pleases him against his will." The author of "Absalom and Achitophel" was speaking of satirical verse, and the truth of what he said applies more strictly to satire in general than it does to poetry in general. So strictly does it apply to satire, indeed, that one may appropriate it to another use in these days when satire is no longer composed in couplets; one may speak of the sweetness in good prose which tickles even while it hurts. One might wish for a more perfect method than exists of determining just how much pleasure is given to the victim of an excellent diatribe. There is no record, for instance, that the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Duke of Buckingham cut joyful capers in 1681 when they read what Dryden had to say of them as Achitophel and Zimri. One can only insist that the victims ought to be tickled—according to the principle, if none other, that the function of art is to please. And one can always fall back upon the fact that at any rate a third party, composed of more or less innocent bystanders, is rendered happy by the slaughter.

Such a piece of excellent prose is Ernest Boyd's article in the current American Mercury on the followers of Walt Whitman. Now, we should never undertake to ascertain the precise pleasure which the persons whom Mr. Boyd believes to be the literary descendants of Whitman will derive from a perusal of this article. Nor could we guarantee that the blindest of Whitman's admirers will find it even in the slightest delectable. But, since we consider ourselves members of neither camp, and therefore are under no necessity of plucking poisoned arrows from our bosom, we freely admit the joy we have taken in the spectacle of Mr. Boyd's sheer skill in denunciation.

He is a rare phenomenon in these lean days of satire, and it is as such that he needs to be recognized. Ben Jonson, Milton, Dryden, and Pope in their respective generations let fly their spears of anointed contempt. The quarterly reviewers of the early nineteenth century in England continued the tradition; Poe nourished it in America in the thirties and forties; Churton Collins on Edmund Gosse and W. E. Henley on Stevenson proved themselves a generation ago to be worthy successors of Jeffrey and Lockhart. Now Mr. Boyd employs the highly suitable medium of the Mercury for a series of essays in every way comparable to the best pieces executed by his predecessors. He is all but unique in his day—if Norman Douglas, author of a recent attack on D. H. Lawrence in England, be excepted as the serious competitor he is. Mr. Mencken, after all, indicts a whole people; Mr. Boyd indicts persons, or at any rate small groups of persons who can be identified if one takes the trouble.

The circumstance that Mr. Boyd is wrong in most of his inferences and facts has nothing to do with the value of his article as art. It is not to the satirists with their indignatio that we go for literary history or even for literary criticism. Dryden was partially wrong about Shadwell, and Henley's strictures upon Stevenson were irrelevant to any discussion of the latter's work. And so there should not be too much cause for resentment in Mr. Boyd's careless connecting of Whitman with the "aesthetic circles" whom he so heartily despises today. His processes seem to have been simple enough. He hated Whitman. He hated the Dial and Miss Marianne Moore. So he pretended to prove that the Dial and Miss Moore are the progeny of the Manhattan bard. Actually to prove this would require labor of a soberer sort than satirists have ever been known to undertake. There is the very respectable theory, for instance, that the "aesthetes" come straight out of France. The scholar would at least announce this theory before denouncing it. What does the satirist do? Having quoted one of the flimsiest passages to be found in all of Whitman, he declares that "the transition is inevitable" to "the great deluge of Futurism, Dadaism, Ultraism, and Super-realism beneath which modern literature is now submerged"; and quotes as an instance of the latter almost a column of Marianne Moore.

Supposing, however, that Mr. Boyd's literary history holds water—his criticism does not. If the aesthetes are damned by their derivation, it does not follow by any law of criticism that the father shall be damned for his children. The greatest of writers have worked havoc among their imitators. Shakespeare perhaps ruined the poetic drama until Yeats, and Milton certainly spoiled blank verse until Wordsworth. But we do not blame Shakespeare and Milton, as Mr. Boyd seems to blame Whitman. Nor would any responsible critic blame Whitman for the fact that his followers preferred his dogma to his art, or even for that preference in Whitman himself. Some of the best of poets have misunderstood themselves; Wordsworth, as it happens, overrated his philosophy also. Whitman was, of course, absurd when he said: "I don't value the poetry in what I have written so much as the teaching." He is valuable for what his practice preaches—that great poetry can be written in new forms. The fact that Mr. Boyd is blind to the beauty of those forms matters little either in the criticism of Whitman or in the criticism of Mr. Boyd as satirist.

"The Enemy"

IN a world flooded with propaganda it is, it seems, an offense to produce a drama with a lesson to teach and a doctrine to expound. At least this is the only possible deduction from the lukewarmness of the metropolitan press to Mr. Channing Pollock's remarkable play "The Enemy." Received in small cities with praise so unbounded as to suggest gross extravagance, it was briefly dismissed or overlooked by one New York critic or another on the ground that it was pacifist doctrine which was produced less for stage than propaganda purposes. It did not matter that the play was brilliantly acted and that its action was simple, straightforward, and extraordinarily affecting. It was a play with a purpose and a mission, and so it received brief space compared to that bestowed upon the latest "girl show" musical comedy. This fact affects a layman curiously because one has always been told that the stage must hold up the mirror to nature. If "The Enemy" does not reflect the actual life of not one but millions of families during the tragic days of the World War, we cannot imagine what could.

There is but one setting from beginning to end—the sitting-room of a professor's flat in Vienna, within which are enacted in miniature the misery, suffering, and starvation, the grief and the spiritual horror of the war which was but a foul conspiracy against the truth and the right from beginning to end and on every side. Mr. Pollock has been bold enough to let us look at the war from the Austrian side through the eyes of a professor who opposed the war and of his daughter who pays the price in the loss of her bridegroom and of the child his father never saw. There is nothing original or strikingly novel in the plot. These are familiar figures all: the profiteer; the aspiring playwright who goes back on his pacifist theories when war is declared; the professor who sticks to his beliefs and loses his professorship for asking everybody the unanswerable question, Why are we at war and what is it all about?; the young Englishman beloved of all until England enters the war, when he is stabbed in the house that he loved; the journalist who without cause incites his countrymen to war and comes back shell-shocked to experience the ingratitude of his employers; and the soldier-servant who brings back the tidings of the playwright's death just as he is expected to return to his home. These are simple ingredients to work with and there are no startling dramatic scenes save the return of the soldier-servant with the horror of it all upon him—a really amazing piece of acting by Harold Vermilye. Yet the play reaches thrilling heights and profoundly stirs audiences, growing in number, whose memories react sharply to the picture presented; who at last realize that they were enmeshed in lies from which we are just beginning to escape.

"A great play" is a phrase so overworked as to be utterly trite, yet we cannot withhold it from one which so honestly earns it as "The Enemy." But Mr. Pollock has done more than write a remarkable drama; he has rendered a service to his country and to the cause of civilization. If our public has seen enough worth in "Abie's Irish Rose" to keep it going for four years, it ought to keep "The Enemy" on the boards as long as has been "Uncle Tom's Cabin." We will add that the present caste is admirable, notably Fay Bainter as the bride and widow and Russ Whytal as the professor-father.

The Aircraft Monopoly

[Copyright, 1925, by the Author]

ANY real investigation by the President's aircraft board or by the Lampert aircraft committee would be worthless unless it inquired into the activities of Howard E. Coffin, C. M. Keys, and their associates of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association, which has been accused on the floors of Congress of being a trust organized and maintained in violation of law. Inquiry must also be made as to the alleged activities of these men in maintaining an espionage system with secret agents attending official hearings and as to what funds, if any, have been disbursed by persons or corporations for such espionage work, propaganda, or for any other activities relating to the subject of the investigations.

The standard of patriotism of the Bureau of Aircraft Production during the war (with which the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association and Howard E. Coffin, president of the Government's aircraft board, had relations) was manifested when the Hindenburg line was still unbroken and plans were on foot to send a second army overseas. At that critical moment a call was made on the Bureau of Aircraft Production for volunteers to officer the proposed army, with the result that out of its hundreds of officers wearing uniforms and not engaged in flying there were seven volunteers for the firing line! That was the standard of morale when the dismal war failure was made, and, in the conditions which exist today, we are not permitted to forget the past. The fact is that this same Bureau of Aircraft Production, organized and manned during the days of Coffin and Deeds, was later absorbed in the post-war aviation organization. Its proteges are a part of the aircraft bureaucracy of today, while the men who protest against these sickening conditions have their necks placed under the heels of the protectors and apologists of those who jeopardized the life of America in time of war.

American aviation has a long list of martyrs to duty which began during the war and continues until today. A committee seeking the truth, and with none of its members under a cloud, would discover, in the following cases among many, the methods used to silence and discredit those who have voiced complaints:

1. Major General William L. Kenly, former head of the Bureau of Military Aeronautics, relieved from duty and demoted from the rank of major general to a colonelcy after testifying before the Thomas Senate committee as to conditions in the air service.

2. A colonel who, because he testified that there were no American-made fighting planes in France, was deprived by the War Department of receiving decorations which a foreign government sought to bestow upon him for overseas services.

3. A major in the Army Air Service who was confined to an insane ward after persisting in making complaints and who was restored to duty after the matter was quietly taken up by friends in Congress.

4. A former member of the Lafayette Escadrille who was placed in an institution for the insane after warning men he was training of defects in aeroplanes made by the Curtiss Aeroplane and Motor Corporation, and who alleges that he was previously warned that this would happen to him if his criticisms did not cease.

5. A pioneer aviator whose airplane was destroyed by incendiary bullets at McCook Field before he had been allowed to fly it and after he had been awarded a distinguished-service certificate by the War Department for the design.

6. An independent aircraft manufacturer who after the war was sent on a mission which carried with it imminent risk of death and who was later framed up and thrown out of government employment. Although the charges against him have been investigated by two departments of the Government and pronounced unfounded he is today discredited, and his name as a reserve officer has been removed from the rolls of the Navy Department because of these charges.

7. The legal adviser of the chief of the Army Air Service who was discharged while appearing before a Senate committee where he offered information in regard to the alleged disappearance of 122 carloads of material, planes, and parts of planes belonging to the United States and valued at more than $900,000, from the Elizabeth, New Jersey, plant of a Japanese aircraft company, which was one of the original members of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association.

These and numerous other definite and specific cases of misconduct, the evidence of which has been accessible to the President's aircraft board and to the Lampert aircraft committee, have not been made the subject of inquiry and such conditions stand unexposed and unrebuked.

While reports of aircraft investigations have usually been made public, this has not always been the case regarding the testimony and hearings on which the reports have been based. During the war when the investigation of Charles E. Hughes was under way and witnesses were testifying as to the conduct of men who were responsible for the aircraft debacle during the war and are still awarded government contracts, a record of the testimony was not made public for the alleged reason that information might fall into the hands of the "enemy." Although we have celebrated our seventh anniversary of the armistice, the Hughes hearings which should be available in libraries have not been published nor is there a copy available for public inspection.

When the hearings of the Thomas Senate committee were published, that portion of the testimony on which it based its findings that methods of the Government's aircraft board and the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association were vicious and intended to reap large profits by taking advantage of the necessities of the Government, was not included in the printed volumes[2] and the typewritten record of the testimony of the witnesses has long since been missing in the archives of the Committee on Military Affairs.

[2] Hearings before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, 65th Congress, second session.

The President's aircraft board and the Lampert aircraft committee failed to call more than fifty available witnesses, some of whom had testified before the Thomas Senate committee and many of whom were the pioneer inventors and independent manufacturers whose sacrifices, broken bones, and mortgaged homes gave aviation to the world. When the Lampert aircraft committee was holding hearings in New York, ostensibly for the purpose of taking the testimony of a group of these pioneers who claimed that they were crushed and driven out of business by the so-called air trust, these witnesses were not called to the stand. According to press reports Representative Perkins, speaking for the committee at a banquet in its honor, made an announcement to the effect that "business" had nothing to fear from the committee's work.

The recent investigations have covered every conceivable phase of the subject except the one that contains the crux of the situation. It is an old saying that if you take the profits out of crime there will be no crime. The solution of our aircraft troubles will be found in the answers to the following questions:

1. Who got the money?
2. What has been done with those who got the money?
3. What is going to be done with those who let the guilty escape?

In the thousands of pages of testimony it will be found that there has been no digging in the broad fields of malversation. In crimes against the government, "the love of money is the root of all evil." While the Thomas Senate committee set forth in its report unthinkable methods of aircraft monopoly practiced against independent manufacturers of aircraft who sought to obtain government contracts, it was clearly stated in that report[3] that

> No attempt has been made to investigate charges of personal dishonesty or official corruption. That subject more properly belongs to the Department of Justice, which under the direction of the Hon. Charles E. Hughes has been conducting an inquiry of its own regarding that and other phases of the subject.

It will be recalled that in no instance have the recommendations for prosecutions proposed in the Hughes report been carried out, and after that investigation, conducted during the war, no presidential board or congressional committee was especially authorized to investigate acts of malversation in connection with the air services, until the appointment by the House of Representatives of the Select Committee of Inquiry into Operations of the United States Air Services, known as the Lampert aircraft committee.

In ordering the investigation intrusted to the Lampert aircraft committee, the authority and direction from the House of Representatives to investigate financial wrongdoing and malversation were plenary and mandatory and any failure to do so would subject the committee to just censure by Congress and the people. House Resolution 192,[4] which was agreed to on March 24, 1924, directed the committee to inquire into the operations of the Government's air services and provided that > said inquiry shall include investigation of contracts, settlements, or audits thereof, letters, expenditures, reports, receipts, or other documents in any way connected with any or all transactions of the said United States Army Air Service, the United States Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, the United States Mail Air Service, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either, and any corporations, firms, or individuals or agencies having any transactions with or being in any manner associated with or controlled or regulated by the said air service.

The Lampert aircraft committee was appointed on March 24, 1924. In view of the fact that the Lampert committee was appointed to investigate charges made on the floor of Congress that men were being killed through criminal negligence and that a speedy report as to the truth of the charges was due to be returned to the House of Representatives, the record of this committee for neglect of duty is probably the worst in the annals of Congress. The Lampert committee did not begin its formal hearings until December 12, 1924, nine months after it was appointed. Although information was read into the record of the House of Representatives on April 15, 1924,[5] that in the opinion of the Department of Justice the statute of limitations would expire in important war-fraud cases on November 12, 1924, the Lampert committee, failing to meet and protest against inaction, must accept a responsibility in the final escape of the war grafters from prosecution.

Notwithstanding the mandatory character of the resolution as to the scope of the investigation which was demanded by the House of Representatives, the Lampert committee upon its organization adopted as a steering chart and as the "Scope of the Inquiry" a questionnaire[6] which was unresponsive to the resolution in detail and in effect and which begins the investigation with the following interrogations:

1. Is war in the future a possibility?

A. Is the United States in a position where we need any further protection against, or preparation for, war?

B. Within what period is it probable, so far as a forecast can he hazarded, war will come?

C. What nation or nations would be our probable enemies in event of such a war?

2. Where will the next war be fought?

Nowhere in the questionnaire is there an opportunity to squeeze in a line of inquiry on the questions raised in the House resolution or to develop the facts as to

1. Who got the money?
2. What has been done with those who got the money?
3. What will be done with those who allow the guilty to escape?

Volume VI of the hearings of the Lampert aircraft committee consists of 604 pages devoted to an index to the 3,558 printed pages of hearings. The index volume comprises 35,969 items, and under the subjects of "Fraud and Corruption" and "Graft" the following testimony alone is cited, viz.:

Fraud and corruption not proved—Coffin.....	1277
Fraud, claims involving, not numerous—Stoeckell....	874

On January 23, 1925, Howard E. Coffin, former chairman of the Government's aircraft board, now president of the National Air Transport, Inc., and at present a member of the President's new aircraft board to report on the aircraft situation for the benefit of the President and Congress, testified before the Lampert aircraft committee[7] as follows:

> Mr. Lea. Now, Mr. Coffin, . . . Do you know of any case where any real case of moral turpitude has developed?
> Mr. Coffin. Only cases where, perhaps, a man who was a bookkeeper or a clerk got away with a few dollars.

Again, Mr. Coffin testified[8] as follows:

> The accomplishments of the War Department in aviation were easily among its best in the war—cranks and manufactured public opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is hardly conceivable that the members of the Lampert committee are not aware that since the exposures on the floors of Congress in 1922 there have been annual appropriations by Congress of $500,000, increased during the last session to an annual appropriation of $1,000,000, for the maintenance of a War Frauds Bureau in the Department of Justice and that numerous aircraft contracts involving millions of dollars, pronounced fraudulent by officials of the War Department itself, have been awaiting prosecution in the Department of Justice for more than three years. In September the Lampert committee disqualified itself from rendering any report when Chairman Lampert released a statement for the afternoon papers in which he said: "Problems are too complicated for congressional determination."

On September 12, 1925, three days after this statement was given to the press by Chairman Lampert, a presidential aircraft board, with Howard E. Coffin named as one of the investigators, was announced, but apparently it was not directed to discover what is wrong with the air service.

In fact, the gist of the President's instructions to his new air board—known as the Morrow committee—was reported in the press as follows:

> I feel that your efforts will result in bringing out the good qualities of the air service and in suggesting what action can be taken for improvement.

If America, whose genius gave the art of heavier-than-air flight to the world, has the brains and the money and pilots with unsurpassed records, why has she lost her place in the sun?

The answer will not be found in the hearings or in the reports of the President's aircraft board and the Lampert aircraft committee. If we are to correct the evils of our air services, accurate and reliable information for the public is necessary. Without it no findings or conclusions can have weight.

While the Lampert aircraft committee has washed the outside of the cup, the Morrow board has done the same for the platter. The application of the nursery rhyme is for the kindergarten class in public affairs:

> Simple Simon went a-fishing
> For to catch a whale;
> All the water he had got
> Was in his mother's pail.

[In his first article, published last week, Captain Scaife summarized the history of the aircraft frauds. His final article, next week, will deal with the Morrow committee report and its suppression of the facts.]

Reservations

By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

GETTING married with reservations is a ticklish business. You have to be sure the reservations are as binding as the marriage. To join some fifty other nations of diverse cultural, ethnological, political, and economic conditions in the upbuilding of a court empowered to decide controversies between sovereigns is a momentous step. It is worse than that; we think it a dull business, and so we turn from it as a recondite riddle reserved for international lawyers. There we err; for, once we examine the project, the problems emerge with the clearness of mountain peaks.

To begin with: What is the object of a world court? Obviously, to prevent war by substituting justice for arms. But the moment we make that answer two further questions pop up. Is the court's decision to be capable of enforcement? If so, how? To these inquiries I addressed myself in two preceding essays; in the former I sought to point out that behind the World Court, as now constituted, lurks the threat of the armed and economic power of the League of Nations and its entire membership for enforcement of the Court's decrees; in the latter I urged that the history of our country—of the relation of our Supreme Court to the States—shows that a world court, stripped of every vestige of such power and depending for its efficacy solely upon the support of public opinion, is a proved practical program.

Let me quote a man who evidently holds similar views: "When two great self-respecting nations deliberately agree to submit their controversy to the Court and actually do so," Senator Walsh recently wrote me, "neither can disregard its judgment. . . ." It was upon this principle that the Fathers wrote the Constitution. Does not that principle hold good today?

In February, 1923, Charles Evans Hughes, then Secretary of State, wrote President Harding proposing four reservations as conditions of our entry into the Court. With the second, third, and fourth reservations, the wisdom of which no one, I believe, gainsays, we need not at the moment concern ourselves further than to mention that they are designed to secure us a voice in the selection of judges, to assure that we pay a fair share of the Court's expense, and to prevent amendment of the Court's charter without our consent. I come to the first and far the most important reservation proposed by Mr. Hughes:

"In order to avoid any question"—I quote from the preamble of Mr. Hughes's letter—Mr. Hughes proposed that our entry into the Court > shall not be taken to involve any legal relation on the part of the United States to the League of Nations or the assumption of any obligations by the United States under the Covenant of the League of Nations.

What is to be deduced from this proposal? There are champions for entry into the World Court who declare that that Court is already wholly independent of the League; that my fear of Articles 13 and 16 is unfounded and absurd. Mr. Hughes's reservation shows that, in his mind at least, there is a real danger that the Court is tied to the League, else he would not have gone to the length of severing that tie.

To those who believe that a world court should be unsupported by any power but that of public opinion, this reservation, then, is welcome. But I ask whether it goes far enough. For while this reservation certainly frees us from the duty of joining with League members in exerting force to execute a world-court decision, does it exempt us from the exertion of force against us if we fail to comply with a decision?

To this question there are two possible answers. The first is that we will always obey and respect the Court's decision. But that is a fool's answer. "Always" is a long word. This Court is no mushroom, but an enduring structure. What kind of a court may render what kind of a judgment against us a century hence? Suppose we are then no longer the rich and powerful creditor nation. Suppose we are literally incapable of complying with the decree. Surely we should not take even the remotest risk of consenting in advance that the League shall have power to enforce such a judgment against us by war or economic boycott.

There is a second answer to the question I propounded; namely, that Mr. Hughes's reservation says just what I would have it mean. It may, but if it does, then the language, to me at least, is veiled. In so profoundly important a matter we cannot, however, afford to be left in doubt. The kind of words I could understand would say explicitly that our entry into the Court is conditioned on the agreement of the League and its members that no decree of the Court shall be enforcible either by the Court, the Council, or the League or its members through war or economic pressure. It is only in some such fashion, I submit, that we can make it forever clear that the Court's only sanction is public opinion.

John Marshall, defending the provisions in our Constitution for a federal judiciary (which were so feared by the States), asked the Virginia Convention this question:

> What is the service or purpose of a judiciary but to execute the laws in a peaceable, orderly manner, without shedding blood or creating a contest or availing yourself of force?

His question is peculiarly applicable to a world court. For, since the purpose of such a court is to avoid bloodshed, contest, and force, why not say so openly? Why not use plain words to divorce the Court utterly from the League? This does not at all require that we destroy the Court; quite the contrary, we make the Court stronger by making it independent. Is not this the path of expediency as well as of wisdom? Senator Borah has squarely stated in a letter to the president of Princeton University that on such terms his opposition to entry into the Court ceases. And as for the advocates of the Court, what is it they want? A court to bring us peace. Well, then, do they oppose a declaration that a court of peace shall not be buttressed by the power of war?

"Shall it be a coercion of law or a coercion arms? There is no other possible alternative." These words were spoken in 1787 by Oliver Ellsworth before the Connecticut Convention. His words hold good today.

The dilemma which faced the people of the United States in 1787 confronts us. We must choose between armies and acquiescence. The decrees of a world court must either be backed by force or must depend solely upon voluntary consent of the sovereign litigants. No other alternative is open. If we mean to do away with force and to depend only upon voluntary consent, let us say so.

The Exuberance of Senator Pepper

By FRANK R. KENT

THE truly good in this world are distressingly often misunderstood. This is particularly and painfully true in politics.

What incentive is there for the righteous and high-minded to slave for the people in public place if, in addition to the gibes of the wicked and unworthy on the other side, they have to bear up under total lack of appreciation from their friends?

Especially poignant are the wounds thus inflicted when the paeans of praise which have been poured out in behalf of these friends impose a slight strain upon the conscience.

Take for instance the case of Senator Pepper of Pennsylvania. Senator Pepper is a gentleman who has unselfishly sacrificed himself in order to serve his State and nation. It is not going too far to say that he will, if pressed, admit it. Whenever he speaks in the Senate or out he somehow manages to convey an idea of the nobility of his nature and the purity of his purposes, which is perhaps one of the reasons so many of his colleagues refer to him privately in language not printable in the record. His goodness grates on them.

Usually when Senator Pepper is on the stump it is his habit modestly but with charming candor to commend himself to his constituents, touching upon the value of his services and pointing out the great mistake it would be not to send him back to the Senate next year. Recently, however, departing slightly from his custom, the good Senator has devoted most of his speeches not to himself but to the most eloquent eulogies of Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Mellon yet delivered in any quarter. In praising these two highly placed gentlemen he has really reached inspired heights. No editorial writer on a Republican organ has been able to think of the things to say that he has. No other Republican Senator facing a fight in his State has gone as far as he. Not William M. Butler himself, whose reelection in Massachusetts wholly depends on his ability to ride the wave of the Coolidge popularity and who ranks as the President's closest friend, has spoken so warmly of him.

It would be natural to suppose this would make Senator Pepper stand ace high around the White House, that the inner Coolidge circle would regard him as the ideal statesman. Publicly they do, but privately it is sad to report some of those fairly close to the President look upon the Pennsylvania Senator with a cold and fishy eye. So far the excessive eulogies seem not to have disturbed Mr. Mellon, but it is a fact that friends of Mr. Coolidge here think that Senator Pepper is overdoing it somewhat so far as the President court, the building of the cathedrals, the composing of Chaucer's poems and Shakespeare's plays, the downfall of the church in England, all took place in about half the time in which the poor little ten dollars is to be accumulating interest. Who has any right to suppose that events less momentous will not take place in the next ten centuries?

* * * * *

THE fate of the ten dollars can be readily imagined. In about the year 2025, when innumerable bank clerks have transferred the dead account through innumerable ledgers, when innumerable mistakes have been made in the computation of the interest, when a dozen bookkeepers have committed suicide because of it, when half as many bank presidents have cudgeled their brains over what to do with it, a council of international financiers will be called to debate the subject of the ill-fated ten dollars. It will be decided that the thing has gone far enough, and a fund will be established for the prevention of cruelty to gold fish, or some other worthy object. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During the past week some 150 people gathered at the Pantlind Hotel in Grand Rapids for the purpose of attending the twelfth annual convention of the International City Managers' Association. They came from all over the United States and several points in Canada. They represent a movement that now extends from Texas to Manitoba and from California to Maine—a movement that is probably contributing more than any other toward a professional and businesslike administration of government in the United States.

The character and quality of the program, the personality of the members, and the general atmosphere of the Grand Rapids convention stamped it as thoroughly professional in tone and character. The chief reason for this is that there are comparatively few men engaged in other lines of public service as a permanent career. Yet relative permanency is a prime prerequisite for the development of a professional spirit and attitude. It is also essential for the development of that expertness that distinguishes one calling from another.

On account of the importance of continuous service in the upbuilding of a profession, a brief summary of the length of service of the nucleus of the present city managers follows. These data are taken from the 1924 report of the City Managers' Association. Of a total of 350, two-thirds have served more than two years and over one-half have served more than three years, while 89 have exceeded four years, 59 five years, 33 six years, and 7 ten years. To properly evaluate these facts it is necessary to consider that the movement was only sixteen years old in 1924, and that Dayton, the first large city to adopt city-manager government, joined the ranks in 1914, that is, ten years previous to 1924.

Willingness to continue experienced men in the office of chief executive marks a striking departure from established procedure in the United States. It indicates that a growing body of our citizens no longer confuse or perhaps identify the power to get votes and the power to conduct public affairs successfully.

The chief contribution to public policy on the part of the city-manager government is, as one of the speakers pointed out, probably just here. It distributes functions according to capacity. The vote-getter, properly representing and interpreting the wishes of the people, is placed where he will do the most good, i. e., in the council, where policy is determined. On the other hand, the appointive expert, who is trained to handle the intricacies of modern city government, is placed where he will do the most good, namely, in the position of executor of policy. In other words, municipal politics are consigned to the municipal council or commission and municipal management is concentrated in the office of the expert executive. This allocation of functions represents a wholesome break with our time-honored faith in the universal capacity and competence of all good and loyal citizens for handling public affairs.

More specific evidence of the professional character of the City Managers' Association may be found in a review of the program of the recent convention. The subjects covered by a select group of speakers dealt with personnel control, with budget and accounting systems, zoning, traffic, fire prevention, with an analysis of the proper attitude of the city manager toward his commission, the public, and outside experts, with the ways and means of determining municipal efficiency on the basis of unit costs, and, finally, with a summary of the practical rules of conduct of the manager in his executive capacity.

The outlook for the city-manager movement is most promising. In the first place, there are only three of the 259 cities that have adopted it by popular vote and later abandoned it by the same method. Secondly, any investigation of the success of the city-manager government, made through requests to local business, professional, and labor organizations has resulted in almost unanimous approval. A committee of clubs of the city of Syracuse, for instance, recently published returns of this sort from eighty different cities with only one unfavorable report out of the total number.

With the accession of Cleveland, Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Rochester, the movement is entering a new phase. If the last three cities that have just adopted a city-manager charter are as successful as Cleveland's has been in its initial period, we may expect a rapid increase in the number of large cities under this type of government during the next decade.

Beatrice Cenci

Former Minister of Fine Arts in the Italian Cabinet

CORRADO RICCI has reconstructed from the original manuscripts a full and vivid chronicle of the Cenci family through two generations. The climax is Beatrice's gallant crime, trial and death. The book is a record of violence, decadence, bloodshed, and corruption, but no more living piece of Renaissance history has ever been printed. Around the person of Beatrice herself, a woman too passionate to be faultless and too strong to be pitiable, the characters of that dead tragedy play out their parts with the coloured and sinister reality of figures in an awful dream.

The Walls of Jericho

By JAMES RORTY

The words of this poem are intended to be spoken as an obbligato to the Negro spiritual, "Joshua Fit de Battle ob Jericho," the music of which is first heard as a faint humming accompaniment to the opening stanzas and gradually swells to a forte chorus at the end.

Watchman, what is your word?
The night is quiet, but that white stone
That rolls above the city is the same
Unpitying moon that shone
On Nineveh, on Babylon
After the kings were gone.

Watchman, what do you hear?
I hear the frantic voice of the unseen
Incessant whip-poor-will that raves
Of something lost; but it can mean
Nothing; it has never been.

Watchman, what do you see?
I see the outpost's fire that flickers red
Between the city and the dark; the black
Fagot wherewith the flame was fed,
Screamed for a while and bled.
Now it is dead.

Watchman, why do you shake?
I shake because there is no rain
To quench that fire, as they well know
Who kindled it; there will remain
Always the pain;
Something unslain.

Watchman, what of our city?
All's well and the streets are bright;
Few felt the cold when we achieved
Our heatless miracle of light.
Like ghosts bedight
They walk in light.

Watchman, our singers sleep!
Not so, but their frozen lips are sealed,
And though they break with furious hands
The altars where they kneeled,
Plow there is none to wield,
Barren is the field.

Watchman, our priests are fled!
Not so, they have gathered all
To the battlements; they shout and fling
Bread at the gates that the tall
Towers may stand, and the wall
May not fall.

Watchman, they come to slay!
Not so, there is no magic in the sword
Can slay what never lived.
Even so was poured
From heaven the word
Of the Lord.

Watchman, they march with songs!
Yes, they come singing; are we then so proud
Of our white silence? Yes, they come
Laughing and loud.
Unarmed, unbowed.

Watchman, your lips do move!
Yes, for I see the great walls fling
Their stones upon the plain,
And we too sing.

Joshua fit de Battle ob Jericho,
Jericho, Jericho.
Joshua fit de Battle ob Jericho,
And de walls come a-tumblin' down.

First Glance

THE success of "The Book of American Negro Spirituals," edited by James Weldon Johnson with musical arrangements by J. Rosamond Johnson and Lawrence Brown (Viking Press: $3.50), is one of the most conspicuous signs that Negro folk music and Negro folk poetry are beginning to secure the general attention they have always deserved in America. For the book has become a best-seller, and concert halls which previously had opened only for Roland Hayes and Paul Robeson are filled these days with audiences come to hear less notable or even entirely unknown soloists. If the spirituals have come to be something of a fad among those who must seek each season for another thrill, and if many of the present devotees are bound to drop away before another winter brings its novelty, this does not matter a great deal. A new circle has been reached; the songs have settled that much more firmly into place. Not a few persons, of course, have always known and admired them, and they have by no means been neglected by musical and literary scholarship. Eleven years ago there was H. E. Krehbiel's "Afro-American Folk Songs," and the current year has seen in "The Negro and His Songs," by Odum and Johnson, an interesting attempt at historical and social analysis. But much still remains to be said.

For instance, there is the matter of origins. In his sensible introduction to the sixty-one songs which he has chosen Mr. Johnson touches this intricate subject in such a way as to make it merely tantalizing. Answering the not infrequent charge that the spirituals are derivative both in their music and in their words, he states as an axiom that they are original and lets it go at that. Now, neither of the two adjectives can have any meaning by itself. No excellent work of art can be wholly derivative, nor, on the other hand, can any work of art be wholly original. The problem of assessing originality is the problem of discovering where something came from and defining the qualities which it collected after it arrived. It was not Mr. Johnson's business to do this—it would take volumes, and I suspect that those volumes will some day be written; but he might have suggested the need of its being done. The research, when it comes at last to be made, will take someone over obscure and fascinating ground—Africa, Europe, and our Southern States; it will pry into more than one primitive religion; it will base itself in part upon an understanding of racial rhythms—if, indeed, they exist; and it will at least skirt the territory of comparative literature.

R. Emmet Kennedy's "Mellows: A Chronicle of Unknown Singers" (Albert and Charles Boni: $5) parallels Mr. Johnson's volume at only a few points. Mr. Kennedy, while he furnishes musical arrangements for a considerable number of spirituals, gives specimens as well of work-songs and other "seculars"; while his particular emphasis is upon the "mellows" and "make-up" songs of the Louisiana Negro. His random sketches of the singers from whom he heard these pieces and his account of the general background from which the material comes are both of value for the picturesque information they preserve; and his versions of the better-known poems are unusually full. The book, however, is neither so rich nor so varied as I had hoped it would be.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Evolution of Farming

History of Agriculture in the Northern United States, 1620-1860. By Percy Wells Bidwell and John I. Falconer. Carnegie Institution of Washington. $4.

Readings in the Economic History of American Agriculture. Edited by Louis Bernard Schmidt and Earle Dudley Ross. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

A History of Agriculture in Europe and America. By Norman Scott Brien Gras. F. S. Crofts and Company. $3.50.

Rural Pennsylvania. By Ralph L. Watts. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

ALTHOUGH agriculture is old, organized agricultural research is exceedingly new. There are two reasons for this: the submerged position of the farmer during a long period and the variety of aspects under which agriculture may be viewed. The importance of farming and the farmer was until recently inadequately recognized; and agricultural research is highly complex, since agriculture, according to one's point of view, is a science—or, better, a group of sciences—a business, an industry, an occupation, or a life. The agricultural experiment stations, the first of which in America was founded only fifty years ago, have devoted their attention chiefly to the strictly scientific side, which means problems of production. Only very lately has stress been laid on economic, sociological, and historical matters. Thus agricultural research is as a whole just coming of age.

That the newness of the subject is not preventing scholarly work is manifest in the first of these books. A bibliography of 725 titles, some of them published volumes, others unpublished manuscripts, suggests the thoroughness with which the authors went into their subject. The statistical data which they have compiled from widely scattered sources, involving prices of farm products as compared with general prices, wages of agricultural labor, exports and imports of animal products, urban concentration, and similar matters, would alone make the book invaluable for reference purposes, while numerous maps and graphs add still further to its usefulness.

The book is not, however, merely a treatise. The narrative is vivid and vigorous and will appeal to any one interested in the rural economy, which was the dominant economy of early America. The quotations from old records, letters and newspapers are frequently fascinating. The chapters that deal with the development of agricultural machinery would be delightful for the illustrations alone. But the subject matter is important as well as interesting. The development of agricultural machinery made economical production possible on the great level lands of the Middle West. Probably the only other matters of equal significance in early American agricultural history were the development of transportation by canal and rail, the growth of urban markets, the various changes in the systems of land tenure, and the organization and education of farmers. Each of these subjects also is fully treated and always the authors are presenting facts without any effort to fit them into a preconceived pattern. The conception of agricultural development must be built up inductively if it is to be of any value.

The second book is made up of selections chosen for college students from various works. That these are mostly secondary rather than primary sources seems somewhat unfortunate. There is already too much college teaching on the basis of secondary sources. Moreover, when writers, teachers, and editors find it no insuperable task to read half a dozen books a week, there is no reason why college students should be satisfied to read half a dozen chapters. This is an excellent work of its kind, but the kind encourages dubious practices.

Mr. Gras's book is the first attempt at a comprehensive discussion of an important subject. One gets a clear if not a vivid picture of agricultural progress. Mr. Gras is a sound economist and his understanding of the development of national economic policies as related to agriculture is detailed and accurate. Few scholars anywhere have a better grasp than he of the inclosure problem. Moreover, his discussion of the physiocratic movement in France, which from 1756 to 1770 emphasized the importance of agriculture, is perhaps the best brief treatment of the subject in print. The physiocrats were the real founders of agricultural economics and, from a certain viewpoint, of the single-tax movement; and an understanding of their position is important to a clear grasp of European agricultural developments since that time.

The chief deficiency of Mr. Gras is his lack of a rural point of view. He manifestly looks at agriculture from the outside. When he quotes he quotes scholarly observers whose views, valuable as they are, need to be balanced by the statements of practical farmers. Moreover, he makes such obvious mistakes in agricultural technique as to indicate that he does not know farming. These errors do not seriously affect the value of the book, but they will impair confidence in it on the part of agricultural students, most of whom are farm reared.

In the Rural State and Province Series, of which "Rural Pennsylvania" is one volume, L. H. Bailey, the general editor, is endeavoring "to present the rural phase of the development of the commonwealths with so much of the physical setting of history as will make plain the reasons for the present state of the agriculture and country life." So far, in addition to Pennsylvania, New York, Michigan, California, and Texas have been treated. The volumes as a whole are sound, balanced, though not brilliant studies, and this volume dealing with Pennsylvania is no exception. Agriculture has been fundamental in all the States and is still the basis of production in most of them, and detailed study of its relationships, State by State, will provide clearer economic, social, and political conceptions.

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD

Dead Reckonings

Dead Reckonings in Fiction. By Dorothy Brewster and Angus Burrell. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.25.

ANY critic not too strongly impelled to glorify his own function will be compelled to admit that instinctive taste has usually afforded a surer criterion of excellence than any carefully formulated set of aesthetic principles. If he be wise he will hesitate in his own practice to base his judgment upon the results of a trial, and if he feels a book to be good he will not undertake to prove it bad either to himself or to others by demonstrating its violation of the canon he has set up. He will recognize that the sources of delight in a work of art have never yet been adequately analyzed, and however completely he may have committed himself at one time or another to a belief that the function of literature is this or that he will have the candor to recognize that upon many occasions he has been delighted and moved when it could be easily demonstrated that he had no right to be.

He may be justified in a belief that as time goes on critical canons become less monstrously inadequate. He may, for example, believe that a philosophy of art which allows for the process of wish-fulfilment will be less often at fault than was that medieval theory which regarded literature as invariably no more than a "sugar-coated pill of philosophy," and which drove its exponents to the most fantastically allegorical interpretations of works which their sound instinct told them were good but which could only be justified by the interpolation of "lessons" far from the minds of those who had created them. But the wise critic, however versed in or fascinated by knowledge of aesthetic or psychological laws, will remember that though keys have been found before there have always remained secrets which they would not unlock. He will navigate the seas of literature by the method of what the authors of this book have picturesquely called "Dead Reckonings"; he will, that is to say, recognize that there are no fixed points determinable in the cloudy firmament of aesthetics and he will guide his course by reference to such relative facts as may be gathered in the obscurity which surrounds him, judging his principles by their results rather than judging results by principles.

In so far as Miss Brewster and Mr. Burrell have committed themselves to any theory it is the broadest one which can be formulated from contemporary thought. They have avoided, on the one hand, that exclusive concern with such abstractions as "form" and "style" which proves so sterile in dealing with an art as intimately related as is current fiction with the actual business of living; and they have, on the other hand, equally avoided that tendency to regard the novel as a mere sociological disputation—which proves, indeed, the exact modern equivalent of the medieval theory of the sugar-coated pill. To the psychologist they grant his contention that the creator of an imaginative work is, at least in many cases, projecting his own soul; but they transcend the psychologist's conception of the purely therapeutic function of such works by a strong insistence upon the fact, intuitively recognized by every intelligent reader, that the result of perusing the novels of, let us say, Henry James, is something a good deal more than a mere realization of the predicament, so acutely analyzed by Van Wyck Brooks, in which James, half American and half European, found himself. There is—and this, rather than the ability to make a clinical diagnosis, is our chief gain—an enrichment of our own capacity for experience. Thanks to it we are enabled to live in a more vivid and varied manner.

Now, as Miss Brewster and Mr. Burrell imply without exactly stating, the real test of the value of any critical theory is not the judgments which it leads us to pronounce but the enrichments of aesthetic experience which it enables us to make. Its value must be determined not by its completeness and truth but pragmatically by the fruitfulness of the attempts to apply it, since a theory which, however true, remains barren in its applications is of no particular value, while one which is much less comprehensive may furnish a valuable instrument in making literary explorations. Consequently the authors of "Dead Reckonings" have devoted a great deal more space to application than to the mere defense of their thesis. They have not attempted to prove from it what writers are best, but they have instead accepted the fact, doubtless discovered empirically, that certain writers, especially Anatole France, Henry James, Dostoevsky, and May Sinclair, have seemed to them of particular interest, and they have embarked upon an effort to interpret these writers by means of the implement at hand. The result is a complete pragmatic justification of their method since it has enabled them fruitfully to discuss their subject. I happen, personally, to believe that the theory which they have stated is the most nearly adequate one which it is possible at the present time to formulate, but the value of their book does not depend upon the truth of this judgment, since the value of the theory as a working hypothesis is clearly demonstrated. James, Dostoevsky, and the rest do indubitably take on a new significance and a new interest when studied in their relations to it, just as other writers took on a new significance and interest when they were studied from the standpoint of Taine's theory that writers are the product of their social environment. Recently augmented knowledge of the psychology of the individual has shown conclusively enough that Taine's hypothesis was not as complete as he imagined, but the value of his interpretations remains; and, no matter what may be the future developments of psychology and aesthetics, the way in which the authors of the present book look at their subjects must remain at the very least one of the revealing ways at which they can be looked. "Dead Reckonings" seems to me one of the most significant studies of the modern novel because it contains both a definitely formulated method and a series of examples of the manner in which that method may fruitfully be applied.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Unclean Peace

La Paix malpropre. Par Alcide Ebray. Milan: Società Editrice "Unitas." 35 francs.

THIS book constitutes the third of a triptych prepared by M. Ebray on the general problems left by the war. Two other studies, "Le Crime de 1914-1918" and "Chiffons de papier," deal with war origins and with the violations of treaties committed by both sides before and during the conflict. The author devotes his first chapters to a rapid synopsis of the ideas embodied in these two volumes and then proceeds to his main purpose, which is a thorough and impartial criticism of the "unclean" spirit of the Versailles Treaty.

M. Ebray's thesis may be summed up as follows: In 1918 Germany was lured into accepting an armistice after the publication of President Wilson's famous "points," which Germany believed were to form the basis of the coming peace negotiations. After the signing of an armistice the unprecedented stipulations of which were tantamount to a complete disarmament of the German army and navy the Allies at the Versailles Conference wilfully imposed upon Germany much harder conditions than those set forth in President Wilson's documents and speeches. In June of 1919 Germany, whose population was being starved by the blockade which the Allies maintained throughout the negotiations, had no option but to accept the treaty imposed upon her.

This attitude of the Allies constituted a flagrant violation of the third point in Wilson's address at Mount Vernon—"the consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct toward each other by the same principles of honor and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern states in their relations with one another—to the end that all promises . . . may be sacredly observed. . . ." Although one may not agree with M. Ebray as to Germany's ability to hold out much longer at the beginning of November, 1918, one cannot but subscribe to his energetic characterization of the Allies' violation of the "principles of honor" as a félonie.

The various chapters of the book build up an analysis of the provisions of the Versailles Treaty considered in the light of Wilson's principles. If one bears in mind that the purpose of the Peace Conference was "only to agree upon the practical details of application of President Wilson's terms," one cannot help agreeing with M. Ebray that a conference which left such a wide gap between the promises made and their actual fulfilment was a mere farce and the outcome of it a monument of injustice.

M. Ebray's work is a worthy contribution to the current discussion of World War problems, and deserves to occupy an important place among the books of the numerous French writers—Gouttenoire de Toury, Morhardt, Renouvin, Fabre-Luce, Judet, Demartial, Margueritte, and others—who are devoting untiring efforts to the cause of justice and truth.

VINCENT GUILLOTON

Rhetoric on the Court

Sovereign States and Suits v. States. By James Brown Scott. The New York University Press. $6.

THIS is a reprint of six elegant lectures delivered at New York University to young gentlemen studying law. The orations deal with high themes—efforts toward peace through arbitration and judicial process. The World Court looms before us; hence this book deserves review.

Largely, the volume is a piece of special pleading; it dwells on the beneficent function of the Supreme Court of the United States in adjudicating controversies between the States, and it applies these suggestive precedents to present world-court problems. Unfortunately, however, the author draws the cloak of silence over such painful scenes as the Dred Scott decision, the Booth case, and the Civil War.

Thus the trouble with the book is that it fails to probe. Indeed, in discussing the World Court Professor Scott wholly blinks the bed-rock question of enforceability of decrees. With a gesture truly magnificent he declares that "the American method made the Court and realized the hopes of men and women of good-will in all parts of the world who dreamed of the day when the powerless hand of justice should stay the sword of the mighty." This is a lovely lyric, but we should have preferred a realistic discussion of Article XIII of the Covenant of the League (under which the present World Court has been created), which declares:

> The members of the League agree that they will carry out . . . any . . . decision that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such decision, award or decision, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Since war is not to be resorted to against nations complying with the Court's decision, what of those who disobey? Will that close corporation, that international Holy of Holies, the Council of the League, declare war on them? With these unpleasant matters Professor Scott does not mar his rosy picture of a world swayed to peace by the "powerless hand of justice."

The confounded scientists have so multiplied death-dealing armaments as almost to spoil mankind's favorite divertissement—the game of war. A world court becomes a crying need. What sort of court is it that the League has really offered us? A court of justice or of arms? How far do the conflicting political, ethnological, and economic interests of the present world limit the analogy presented by the relation of the Supreme Court of the United States to the States? On these questions Professor Scott could have thrown light if instead of developing commonplaces of constitutional history at tedious length he had used his erudition in a hand-to-hand grapple with contemporary realities.

JAMES N. ROSENBERG

Amy Lowell

What's O'Clock. By Amy Lowell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.25.

WALDO FRANK in "Our America" calls Amy Lowell "the first American man of letters," and the designation is a particularly happy one. Not that her work is typically American in any overt sense—as is, for instance, the work of Sandburg or of any one of half a dozen writers I could name. A certain pallor of personality that she transmitted to her work—a pallor that is not the paleness of an opaque substance but of a thin and clear light—is subtly suggestive of New England. Otherwise she was not the kind of writer who becomes representative of a young country or movement. And of that violent and reproductive American spirit, the spirit of New York, that is passion cemented in stone, she felt, or at least expressed, nothing. The one pioneering passion indubitably hers was energy—the energy of a mind stimulated by much and good reading and prodded by a dominant will to like achievements. An instinctive connoisseur of words, she had all the fastidiousness of the literary taster. Admiring the masters of literature, she desired a place among them, and, in a sense, attained it. She was almost as striking an example of the self-made artist as was Flaubert or as were the Goncourt brothers. With a drier and more meager emotional stratum than any of these, she shared their indefatigable industry and patience for research. And though wanting Flaubert's lusty fleshhood, she had his power of visualizing and vividly depicting past events. In Amy Lowell the explorer did not include the discoverer. She was a digger in the tombs of kings, but though she laid bare the bones she did not reconstruct their contours nor blow into them the breath of life. Perhaps her own spiritual vitality was insufficient for this. Her mental vivacity was not in the nature of an overflow. It did not compel a concentration of the forces in that uprising and outgoing of consciousness that we recognize as creative expression.

Always she was the true craftsman, incapable of pose or of slipshod workmanship. But her often fine artistic expression seems to have been the result of secondary rather than of primary aesthetic emotion. To the last she came nearest not in the greatly overestimated Patterns but in the lovely and tender Lilacs in "What's O'Clock." These lilacs,

> False blue,
> White,
> Purple,
> Color of lilac,

are not merely outlines of painted petals. They retain all the pain of growing things, so that the delicate tints glow like blood. It is color—the pale sharp color of New England—coming up as out of snowed-in roots.

> Roots of lilac under all the soil of New England,
> Lilac in me because I am New England.

But generally she recognized only the beauty that had already, in some form, been filtered through another mind. She did not permit herself direct contact with the raw ores of things. And she apparently cared little for the larger aspects of nature, although she often noted, and interpreted with a poignant delicacy, some graceful detail:

> . . . the curve of a blue bay beyond the railroad track
> Is delightful and sweet to me like the sudden springing of a tune.

Miss Lowell had, in a remarkable degree, the capacity for orderly thought combined with mental clarity and the power of intense concentration. This combination of qualities enabled her to carry such sustained efforts as the "Keats" and some of the longer poems to a triumphant conclusion. Though with all her comprehensive outlook she had little intuitive aesthetic vision, she retained to the last, undiminished, her eager and piquant perceptivity; and "What's O'Clock" contains, I think, her finest poems. Flaws a plenty may be found, but it is a book which none can demolish. Brittle much of it is, but it is the brittleness of stained glass which, when shivered into bits, retains not only its polish but its intrinsic luster.

I feel that, despite her well-organized mind and the orderly procession of her thought, Miss Lowell's work lacks unity in the deeper sense. Factual unity is there, but that living, vibrating thread that should bind the whole together in a kind of Siva dance is missing. Its outward semblance is achieved by the cohesion of words which, poured out hot, adhere to one another without the aid of a central cord. Except in Lilacs and a very few other poems her aesthetic color is applied from without. It is not a welling of color from within, such as one finds in the poems of Bodenheim and Marianne Moore—I instance these two because their work, like Miss Lowell's, is charged by an intellectual rather than by an emotional intensity. And while Amy Lowell used words as rapiers they remain always foils. They draw, and shed, no blood. Even Evelyn Ray, in spite of its vividness and dramatic qualities, remains a bloodless tragedy.

It is difficult now, and impossible in the short space of a review, to attempt to estimate Miss Lowell's importance to her age and to America. Like all fine craftsmen whose first loyalty is to self-expression she has a definite place in this as she would have had in any other age. She did valiant service for her craft and for many of her contemporaries. Yet I find in her work scarcely a hint of hidden reservoirs. So completely has she sounded her own shallows, missing no pink curl of a shell or glint of a single bright-colored pebble, that one feels that all has been exquisitely said. She was not a great artist. But she was, and will probably remain, a spectacular and scintillating figure in American letters. LOLA RIDGE

In Charleston

Porgy. By DuBose Heyward. George H. Doran Company. $2.

DUBOSE HEYWARD, white man and native of Charleston, has built up in "Porgy" a fresh and finished picture of the soul of the simple Southern Negro. As a racial outsider, who for all his candor and sympathy stands inescapably apart from his subject, Mr. Heyward still writes with an unerring certitude, an assured intimacy. This is in the main possible because the theme of "Porgy" is not essentially a Negro theme; it is a general one, tempered by the particular traditions and superstitions of its locale. Were this a tale of the Negro's sundered world, his inner and insular reaction to the alien life about him, one would marvel at the white author's intuition and subjective accuracy; it is, instead, a unified drama of human passions independent of their setting.

The stripped story could occur in a hundred different places. It could flash its course in a French fishing village; its tragedy could beat forward to a conclusion, as Tess's does, along the green countryside of England. Mr. Heyward places it in his own city of Charleston, among the swarming Negroes who inhabit the tenement called Catfish Row. And because he writes with poetry and penetration his story is a moving one; because he writes with detachment and tenderness, from keen-eyed acquaintance with these people, a fusion of comedy and tragedy is delicately achieved. His full-blooded Negro dozing in atavistic calm beneath the noonday glare of the sunlight; the primitive bestial fight; the hysteria of the funeral gathering, breaking into prayers and spirituals, and the plunging crowd of mourners sweeping out of the cemetery because "De las' man in de grabe-yahd goin' tuh be de nex' one tuh git buried"—these are episodes of admirable force. And the hurricane is worthy of Conrad. LENORE G. MARSHALL

Books in Brief

A Treatise on International Law. By William Edward Hall. Eighth edition edited by A. Pearce Higgins. Oxford University Press. $12.

They should stop publishing new editions of this once standard treatise. One could hardly gather from the text or from the notes by the editor that a very considerable number of the so-called laws of war for the protection of neutrals were egregiously violated by the British Government in the late war, to the permanent injury of international law as a moderator of unrestrained force. For a British publicist to point to German conduct in the late war as violative of international law, while seeking to justify British conduct from a legal standpoint, seems ironic. The editor deludes himself into the belief that Great Britain has not indulged in the confiscation of private property, because the German Government "assumed" the obligation to pay its expropriated nationals—though the Allies have consistently prevented Germany from performing the obligation. Having now through its notes become a "patriotic" book, Hall's work has lost much of its value as a scientific treatise.

The Real Boy and the New School. By A. E. Hamilton. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Mr. Hamilton has lived with boys in camp and field and in the class-room; knowing them in their own worlds, he has gained an insight into their inner life; boy psychology has taught him that the real boy is not the conventional boy. Right attitudes toward life and work, the control of the passions, the gaining of self-knowledge without introspection, the capacity for team work—this is the training which he would give. Through all this runs the idea of the conflict between the desires of youth and the fears of adults concerning them. A country made up of men so trained will act coherently in emergencies, for such men will have learned to be citizens in a democracy.

Boileau and the French Classical Critics in England (1660-1830). By A. F. B. Clark. Paris: Édouard Champion.

It would be difficult to imagine a more satisfactory monograph than Mr. Clark's. Dealing chiefly, of course, with Boileau, it avoids both the major and the minor pedantries which beset the study of literary "influences" at the same time that it accepts the whole responsibility involved. With ample learning, excellent taste, and saving humor Mr. Clark proceeds to show as nearly as possible the total effect of a great French critic and poet upon English literature during a century and a half. Boileau as a critic might have been treated by almost any scholar industrious enough to extract opinions and compare passages; Boileau the poet, however, demanded a scholar with delicacy of perception and some knowledge of how writing is done. Mr. Clark, being sensitive as well as sedulous, has made it quite unnecessary for his subject to be taken up again.

Travel in England in the Seventeenth Century. By Joan Parkes. Oxford University Press. $7.

A richly illustrated and documented account of roads, conveyances, lodgings, officials, and highwaymen; a significant chapter in social history.

Movements in European History. By D. H. Lawrence. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

"Intended for adolescents," this book, first published in 1921 as by Lawrence H. Davison, celebrates the surging energies which moved the peoples of Europe between the death of Rome and the birth of a unified Germany. With few of the marks of Mr. Lawrence's famous style, it has his point of view toward the "unknown powers" within the animal man; and it is creditable history.

Atlantis in America. By Lewis Spence. Brentano's. $4.

The author of "The Problem of Atlantis" here confines to the American continent his search for traces of the civilization in which he so passionately believes.

NOTE: Through an error the catalog of "German Books" reviewed in The Nation for November 18 was given as a publication of the Columbia University Press.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Fernand Léger

TAKEN in a purely formal sense every art movement of any consequence is a congeries of certain technical methods which in their totality differentiate it from every other movement. Cubism, essentially intellectual in its nature, has a well-articulated system of principles and is supported by a goodly amount of analytic reasoning. Cubism begins by a rather conservative revision of an academic formula. The academic picture shows as many facets of an object as can be seen at one glance. Cubism assumes it to be perfectly logical to show more: its back and bottom along with its sides and front; its internal structure along with its external aspect (simultanéisme).

If carried to great length this procedure would result in an ultra-realism and end in confusion. The cubists, therefore, took the method early under control. Since their aim is not objective truth but plastic significance, they have ever been ready to sacrifice the former to the latter whenever the two come into conflict, as happens not infrequently. For the utilitarian and aesthetic functions of concrete objects are disparate. The structure of a chair or a teapot answers to a definite function. The chair is built to sit on, the pot to boil water in. Now these objects, however useful in their practical application, may be, in whole or in part, entirely superfluous as compositional units in a picture. In such cases doing violence to natural appearance is entirely justified. Accordingly, to obtain certain harmonious or contrasting relations it sometimes becomes necessary to seek in one object the elements lacking in another. Certain objects might be welded into a unit and kept in one plane (complémentarisme); other objects, on the contrary, might be dissected and distributed through several planes (divisionisme). In this manner would be established a measured coordination among all the elements—volume, plane, line, color, light—which produce a self-contained work of art.

This is not the whole of cubism, but this is as much as Léger's work illustrates in various degrees (Société Anonyme: Anderson Galleries). For the rest, he differs from most cubists in his predilection for bright, decorative color-combinations and in his preference for mechanical and urban subjects. And while his themes make him the most contemporary of all cubists his polychrome effects in geometric pattern (common to many cubists) endow his work with a wide appeal. For it is one of the few fairly established laws in the more than dismal science of aesthetics that ornamental design in all ages and among all peoples, whether it begin by imitating the shape of man, of animal, or of plant, tends to assume a geometric pattern, so that frequently its origins become unrecognizable.

Léger's work is in this quality akin to all folk art both in its genesis—reflecting a contemporary theme—and in its goal—creating a harmonious pattern. This is, probably, also the reason why Léger's work lends itself so readily to application. His decorations for the Swedish Ballet (Skating Rink, Création du Monde), his sets for the cinema (Marcel L'Herbier's "L'Inhumaine"), and his book illustrations (Ivan Goll's "Chapliniade," Blaise Cendrar's "La Fin du Monde") are excellent.

Léger himself is of the opinion that the utility of anything does not necessarily detract from its beauty (La Beauté est partout). In fact, he unhesitatingly affirms that the proportion of beauty among machine-made things manufactured with the aid of anonymous artisans is greater by far than it is among pretentious pictures turned out by titled academicians. But he is careful to point out ("L'Esthétique de la Machine") that these factory products are to be enjoyed for their own sake, because like all beautiful things they are uncopiable.

The influence of mechanical industrial civilization on art is indirect and, therefore, all the more subtle. The economy in the use of materials, the logic of their coordination, the precision of their functioning, the abstract geometric contour of their mass fill our environment, affect our vision, enter our consciousness, fashion our tastes.

The theory of an artist is usually a rationalization of his own practice. Léger's work is charged with the rhythm of the present mechanized world. Some forms employed by him are borrowed from it and used in novel combinations, others are suggested by it and transmuted beyond recognition. In the end objective verisimilitude yields to aesthetic reality.

French art has had a wide though not always salutary influence on modern art in America. Léger is one of the very few whose work pleads with American artists for an American orientation, a closer contact with their industrial civilization so rich in plastic possibilities, and a consequent florescence of an original indigenous art. By a common perversity of circumstances this is precisely the message least heeded.

LOUIS LOZOWICK

Drama

The Unco Guid

DURING the seventeen years that Ludwig Thoma's satiric comedy "Morals" (Comedy Theater) has awaited an American production much water has flowed under dramatic bridges. Respectability has received a good many hard knocks during the interim, and the crash of falling idols does not startle as violently as once it did. The idea that a prostitute may have a more decent sense of fair play than a vice crusader has been gradually transformed from a paradox into something dangerously near a theatrical platitude, and the emotions with which we watch the too virtuous go down are not quite what they were when the spectacle was more refreshingly new. Though I am far from denying that it is still pleasant to see the pompously moral trip up, yet I must confess that my emotion flows in a well-worn groove and that before the curtain of such a play as "Morals" goes up I am as intellectually convinced of all that it will demonstrate as any devotee of conventional melodrama was ever convinced of the rightness of the sentiments which he applauded when the upright hero snatched the heroine from the arms of the city-bred villain who was persecuting her. Through the course of time critical plays cease to seem acutely critical, and Thoma's story of the reformer who is reformed when his own particular bawdy house is raided by the police has, without ceasing to be amusing, been transformed into something not much more important than a diverting farce. Thanks to its author's very genuine sense of fun it remains even now highly ludicrous, but it seems, as social satire, somewhat commonplace and superficial since it arouses no new thought and releases no new emotion.

Intellectually the best scene is that in which the reformer is driven to a reductio ad absurdum of his position and maintains that the important thing is not that the upper classes should be moral but that, for the edification of the masses and the security of the social order, they should seem to be. There are, also, passages in which the dialogue achieves an excruciatingly absurd irony—passages like the one in which the president of the vice society explains his fall with the words: "You have no idea how hard it was for me to overcome my principles—but I did overcome them," or like that other in which the self-sacrificing student of obscene literature proves the danger of such abominations by admitting that upon one occasion their influence corrupted even him—but intellectually the play suffers from the defect inherent in all plays based upon the Tartufe motif. The assumption that the puritanical priest is always or even usually ready to seduce the daughters of his admirers or that the reformer is himself actually a practitioner of the vices against which he declaims is an assumption more dangerous to the cause of those who make it than it is to the cause of the professional reformer. Unfortunately the hypocrisy of the unco guid is not usually of so obvious a sort, and there are doubtless crusaders whose actual lives could bear the most rigid of investigations. I am perfectly sure that Mr. Volstead doesn't drink, and so far as I know no scandal has ever attached itself to the name of Mr. Sumner. "Tartufe" and "Morals" leave their withers unwrung, and no satire which fails to touch the guiding spirits of the movement against which it is directed can be counted very effective for its purpose. It is not, as Gibbon said in one of the most poisonous of all his poisonous sentences, the vices but the virtues of the clergy which make them dangerous.

Perhaps one does always lust after the indulgences which one would deny to others, and perhaps the prosecutor of obscene literature is at bottom gratifying the same desires as those who purchase in more frank self-knowledge; but lusts are not always directly gratified nor motives consciously realized, and the psychology of reformers is not completely exposed when one of them is shown seeking consolation in the arms of a prostitute. Freud understands the real Tartufes more completely than Molière was ever able to understand them, and no satire upon the vice crusader can be very profound which does not allow a larger place to rationalizations and sublimations than it does to the relatively undangerous vice of conscious hypocrisy.

The chief distinction of the production given the play in question by the Actors' Theater is the result of the very capable acting of a newcomer who goes under the name of Marian Warring Manley and who contributes a very effective interpretation of the role of the discreet prostitute. The piece is played—wisely I think—in a rather broad manner by an adequate but, with the exception made above, undistinguished cast.

The text used is that of the translation made and published some years ago by Charles Recht; though it has been tinkered with by Sidney Howard. "Morals" remains, in spite of its defects, one of the most interesting plays in a season which has not, so far, set any very high standard.

Two other plays of the week concern themselves with the serious discussion of contemporary life. "Young Blood" (Ritz Theater), by James Forbes, the long silent author of "The Chorus Lady," rejoices in a remarkable cast, including Norman Trevor, Florence Eldridge, and Helen Hayes. Thanks partly to them it succeeds in being a continuously interesting comedy-drama without ever going very deeply into that criticism of the "younger generation" which the author apparently intended. Rachel Crothers's "A Lady's Virtue" (Bijou Theater) contains scenes embodying some shrewd observation of American life, but its discussion of muddled morality does little more than increase the muddle. When, for example, the husband concerned, after spending a week with a fascinating opera singer, readily forgives himself he has to know that his wife has not actually yielded to her lover before he is willing to take her back. Miss Crothers seems to consider this exiguousness less the result of general caddishness than some sort of tribute to the purity of womanhood. The piece is effectively if not very subtly acted by Mary and Florence Nash. "The Deacon" (Harris Theater) is a well-made comedy built exclusively for not very sophisticated audiences. It serves its purpose very well indeed.

The Czecho-Slovak Elections

By JOHN O. CRANE

THE outstanding result of the general elections held in Czecho-Slovakia on November 15 is that the parliamentary majority of the present Coalition Government under Premier Svehla was slashed to a nominal figure. Preliminary estimates gave the Coalition only about 158 votes out of a total of 300.

Thus the Coalition as it now stands is doomed. Created during the war on the program of a united front against Austria, it served the new-born republic through many perils and vicissitudes. As the Coalition functioned through a caucus of the leaders of the five major Czecho-Slovak parties it was called the Petka, or Big Five. An outgrowth of the original revolutionary committee, the Petka jealously guarded its extra-legal powers. Thus decisions in the first instance were always reached in the Petka, and later referred to Parliament or the Cabinet, as the case might be, for regularization. Despite its shortcomings the Petka has been a veritable source of strength to the new parliamentary regime in Czecho-Slovakia.

Suffrage is universal and equal in Czecho-Slovakia, and the exercise of this right is compulsory to all eligible citizens. Punishment for non-voting is relatively severe; in the first instances, fines, and, later on, imprisonment from one day to a week. Extenuating circumstances, such as illness, are, however, recognized by the authorities. This provision for compulsory voting means that more than half the population take part in general elections. Further, there is proportional, not geographical, representation, and votes must be cast according to strict party lists. A party need therefore capture but a single seat to have its leader elected to Parliament, as he is naturally put first on the party list. Finally, for the sake of public convenience, elections are always held on Sunday.

Though final returns from the recent elections in Czecho-Slovakia have not yet reached this country, the changes in the lower house approximately are:

Czecho-Slovak Coalition Parties
Agrarians	42	44
Clericals	21	31
Social Democrats	55	29
National Socialists	27	28
Nationalists	22	13
New Industrialists	6	13
Total Coalition	173	158
Opposition Parties
Communists	22	42
German-Magyar Agrarians	13	23
Slovak Clericals	11	21
German-Magyar Social Democrats	30	19
German-Magyar Clericals	9	14
German-Magyar Nationalists	10	11
German-Magyar National Socialists	5	8
Minor parties	21	4
Total Opposition	121	142
Total Parliament	294	300

The above table shows that the Coalition majority has been cut from 173 to 158 seats. The first five parties on the list have hitherto made up both the Petka and the Government, but there is no question that the new Industrialist Party will join the ranks of the reorganized Coalition. With the exception of the not unexpected triumph of the Communists at the expense of the Czecho-Slovak Social Democrats there has been little change in the relative strength of the Coalition in Parliament.

Let us first probe the causes of the rout of the Social Democratic forces. In 1920 the Social Democrats came into Parliament with nearly twice as many seats (about seventy-five) as any other party. At that time, however, the Communists formed the left wing of the party. After the failure of the Communist coup in December, 1920, the latter group broke away from the Social Democrats, taking with them some twenty-two Deputies. Local elections held in 1923 and 1924, however, revealed that these twenty-two seats came nowhere near representing the strength of the Communist Party in the country at large. About two years ago the Social Democrats had the misfortune of losing their able leader, Tusar, who had been twice Premier. Since Tusar's death the Social Democrats have degenerated into doctrinaire, nineteenth-century Marxists.

It should be further noted that the Communists, the only party in Czecho-Slovakia which cuts through national lines, have also gained at the expense of the German-Magyar Social Democrats. During the last year or two the Communist Party has been torn by internal dissensions as to whether it should continue its Moscow affiliations. The more moderate elements declared Soviet tactics could not be used in a highly organized country like Czecho-Slovakia, whereas those "encouraged" by the Third International violently opposed this view. While this basic internal issue is probably not settled forever, the anti-Moscow forces were routed, and a definite, positive program was adopted which spelled the ruin of the Social Democrats.

Looking again at the above table, we see that within both the Coalition and the Opposition there has been a distinct drift toward the right. Here the increased strength shown by the three branches of the Clericals, which, like the Agrarians, draw most of their votes from rural districts, is especially worthy of note.

First of all let us examine the position of the Czech Clerical Party whose gains in the recent elections were not entirely foreseen. Earlier in the year public opinion in Czecho-Slovakia was divided over the proposal of celebrating Huss Day (July 6) for the first time in history. Jan Huss is a national as well as a religious figure in Czech history. The Clericals as Catholics were, of course, forced to oppose any recognition of Huss's historical position, but, on the other hand, the Czech Clericals, though reactionary, have always been a patriotic party for political reasons. Here we run straight into the most puzzling political paradox in present-day Czecho-Slovakia. Contrary to specific instructions from the Vatican and the higher clergy, the Czech Clerical Party supported the Government in favor of the Huss holiday on the distinct theory that if they were to withdraw from the Cabinet the Socialists would be in position to push through the incompleted program for the separation of church and state. Thus one of the big issues of the electoral campaign was the religious issue, and the Clerical successes throughout the country are another indication of the Catholic reaction which is gaining headway all over Europe.

With respect to Clerical gains in Slovakia the situation is entirely different. Despite what Professor Seton-Watson calls the most remarkable example of cultural progress to be found in modern history, discontent in Slovakia is wide-spread. Under the able and adventurous leadership of Father Hlinka, the Slovak People's Party has effectively capitalized the war cry of local autonomy which will free Slovakia from the domination of Prague bureaucratism. When noting the Clerical successes in Slovakia it must be remembered that these people, as a result of a thousand years under Magyar rule, have had very little experience with representative government. Thus when Dr. Benes was Prime Minister a peasant deputation from Slovakia told him in all seriousness that to them autonomy meant paying no taxes.

Of particular danger to the liberal and socialist forces in the republic is the possibility of a union between the Czech and the Slovak Clericals, which would give them a total representation in Parliament of some fifty-two seats. Though the Czecho-Slovak Agrarians have now only some forty-four seats, there is little likelihood that they will form a single party with the German-Magyar Agrarians to bring their total up to some sixty-seven seats. Thus with these fifty-two seats the new Czecho-Slovak People's Party, as it might be called, would have a right to demand the office of premier, which is now held by the Agrarian leader, Svehla. So long as Svehla lives there is little likelihood that this master politician can be removed from office, but his health for years has been anything but robust. Nevertheless, excluding for the time being the possibility of a consolidation of Clerical forces, it seems certain that the Socialists are no longer in position to have great influence on the policy of the revamped Coalition.

There is a story which is an excellent illustration of the political philosophy of Svehla. During the Communist danger in 1920, referred to above, the Communist leader met Svehla in the lobby of Parliament and boasted to him that a proletarian dictatorship would soon be set up in Czecho-Slovakia which would annihilate his (Svehla's) and all other parties. Svehla replied to the Communist taunt that the dictatorship would not fundamentally affect party strife, and that if necessary he and his Agrarians would join the Communist ranks and beat them within the bosom of their own party.

Though the gains of Svehla's party in the late elections have been slight, the Agrarians' position is well fortified. This for two reasons: (1) It is the only Czecho-Slovak party which has effectively extended its influence into Slovakia, and (2) it is largely responsible for the putting into execution of the land reform under which, at the expense of the large land-owners more than half a million hectares have already been distributed among half as many farmers.

Of some importance to the Coalition is the rise of the new Industrialist Party, which roughly represents what we term the petty bourgeoisie. Largely because of able leadership and the organization of a concrete program, it proceeded to slaughter the Nationalists under ex-Premier Kramar, whose party is now identified with Big Business. The success of the Industrialists means that they will enter the new Cabinet with at least one portfolio at their disposal.

Conscience and Women!

THE economists tell us that our civilization would be destroyed by another world war. The clergy tell us that to avert such a catastrophe we must awaken man's conscience. But has man a conscience? Sometimes we doubt it, and look to the women. Lady Cynthia Mosely is a Socialist candidate for Parliament; Lady Warwick gives her estate for a Labor College. These ladies belong to the ruling class, and are motivated by conscience. No doubt there are other women who hold power, and would like to use it to save the race, if they knew how.

Kate Crane-Gartz is the sister of an ex-ambassador, and heir of one of America's great fortunes. Her second volume of letters reveals an American "great lady," using her power for the masses. A beautiful woman, in a home of luxury, scorns that luxury, and spends all her time challenging the social order and defending the social rebels.

Two years ago we published a book of Mrs. Gartz's letters, "The Parlor Provocateur." Now, in answer to demands from all over the world, we have collected the recent letters. They are straight-forward, daring, full of a soul's nobility. They will make a startling Christmas gift for your friends.

It has been said that Benes personifies Czecho-Slovak foreign policy. This is true in the sense that his policy of conciliation is by far the best one for Czecho-Slovakia to pursue. Benes's party, the National Socialists, came out of the fray as the true liberal party. On the whole their position is sound. It is generally believed—and in my opinion, rightly—that Benes has no serious competitor for the portfolio of Foreign Minister. Though now forty-one years of age and in good health Benes has always worked under a tremendous strain. Should his health fail the direction of foreign affairs might fall to either the Agrarians or the Clericals. In the event of an Agrarian Foreign Minister the policy of Czecho-Slovakia abroad would be reintegrated along the lines of the Green International, which Svehla organized some years ago. Should the Clericals, on the other hand, get possession of the Foreign Office, there is no question that they would inaugurate a pro-Catholic policy. Change or no change, Czecho-Slovakia is inevitably drifting away from the French influence in her external affairs.

In order to facilitate a redistribution of ministerial offices which is now necessitated, the Svehla Cabinet has resigned. Though the Czecho-Slovak coalition system is more than likely to be preserved, it is now in order to dissolve the famous Petka.

DISTINCT PROGRESS toward a real disarmament congress has been made at Geneva. What is more, it is not to be limited to land disarmament, for France, Japan, and Italy have insisted that no distinction whatever shall be made between military and naval armaments in the program on which the special commission of preparation for disarmament will begin work on February 15. No fewer than fifty-four nations have thus committed themselves to a study of the questions of armaments and what may be termed military resources. That it is a far cry from this to actual disarmament we are ready to admit, but it is none the less a great thing that for the first time in the history of nations a survey of this kind is being made. Moreover, everything that keeps alive the discussion of disarmament is of value. Invitations are to be sent to Russia and the United States and Germany to take part. The invitation to us puts Mr. Coolidge in a hole. That muddy-minded gentleman who talks disarmament on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays and more preparedness on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays—when he does not speak up for both on the same days—has declared himself opposed to a discussion of disarmament on sea in connection with the limitation of land forces. He will now have to recede from his position or leave the United States out of the congress. If he should take that stand, it would be necessary for public opinion to assert itself without a moment's loss of time. We took the lead in the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments in Washington; we must not be absent from the one at Geneva. Meanwhile, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt has made a most admirable suggestion that we negotiate at once a Locarno pact of our own with Japan and thus decrease further the military and naval rivalry between the two countries.

WHEN THE PERMANENT COURT of International Justice decreed that the Council of the League of Nations should have final arbitral power to decide the dispute over the boundary between Turkey and Iraq it set the League a task that will most ruthlessly test its powers. For between Turkey and Iraq lies Mosul, and the boundary line must either give the oil and wheat of that small chunk of valuable real estate to the Arabs of Iraq to be exploited by their merciful mandatory Great Britain or it must give them to the Turkish Government which promised the people of Turkey way back in 1920 that Mosul would be theirs. The boundary commission sent out by the League to report on this problem offered three possible, and wholly conflicting, solutions: (1) Mosul should go to Iraq provided Great Britain would continue as mandatory for twenty-five more years. (Great Britain was more than willing.) (2) Otherwise the territory should go to Turkey. (3) Or, finally, if all else failed, the territory might be divided. At that time no one would consider number three, so the choice remained between the other two pleasantly diametrical proposals. But Turkey's representative on the League Council refused to pledge himself to accept the Council's decision (the opinion of the majority was known to favor Great Britain); and war hovered over the Near East. Colonel Amery, Great Britain's pugnacious representative, breathed shrapnel and poison gas, and talked about British responsibilities. Tewfik Rushdi Bey withdrew from the Council. As we write, however, signs of reconciliation appear. Tewfik, after an interview with Briand, has hinted at the possibility of a compromise. This might be accomplished by a division of the territory or by special compensations to Turkey on the part of the British. The latter course is the one toward which Great Britain is most favorably disposed.

THE APPEAL of "law and order"—with the harrowing specter of a "red" reign as the alternative—has won another election. This time it was in Australia, and the exact slogan of the stand-patters was the alliterative phrase "Communism or the Commonwealth." It was sufficiently effective so that in the parliamentary elections the coalition government of Mr. Bruce—supported by the Nationalist and the Country parties—has slightly increased its lead in the House of Representatives and has a working majority in the Senate. The defeat of Labor is attributed to dissatisfaction over the shipping strike and to the fact that Mr. Bruce was able to tag his opponents as communists without adequate rebuttal. Nevertheless, a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says that the Labor Party has largely reestablished itself since its losses during the war. This is evident from its position in the parliaments of the six states of the commonwealth. In 1918 the Nationalist Party controlled all the state parliaments except that of Queensland, whereas now Labor is in the saddle everywhere except in Victoria. Incidental to the recent commonwealth elections it may be noted that the new compulsory voting law—under which failure to cast a ballot is punishable by a fine of £2—raised the number of those going to the polls from 60 per cent in 1922 to 90 per cent this year.

IN A RECENT ISSUE [November 11] we gave some authoritative facts and figures setting forth the astonishing industrial recovery of Russia. Across our desk now comes the balance sheet of the All-Russian Textile Syndicate, with offices at 120 Broadway, New York City. This corporation is the American agent for the Soviet Government's textile trust which manufactures 96 per cent of Russia's cotton, wool, silk, and linen goods. The balance sheet is duly certified by one of New York's leading firms of certified public accountants, and it is further announced that Simpson, Thatcher and Bartlett are the general counsel. The total assets on September 30, 1925, were almost $14,000,000. During the fiscal year ended on that date over $44,000,000 of raw cotton, dyes, and machinery were purchased in the United States. In all 298,000 bales were shipped to Murmansk and thirty-one steamships were chartered to transport the merchandise. For the previous year 220,000 bales were shipped. Meanwhile the parent company in Moscow estimates the production of finished cotton goods for 1925 at 65.4 per cent of the 1912 total; of woolen goods, 82.7 per cent; of linen goods, 107.3 per cent. Where less than 300,000,000 meters of cotton goods were manufactured in 1921, 1,500,000,000 meters will be turned out this year. Linen has jumped from 35,000,000 meters in 1921 to 115,000,000 in 1925.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION in Porto Rico is critical, as is evidenced by the protest recently submitted to President Coolidge by Santiago Iglesias, on behalf of the Free Federation of Workingmen, as well as by the last report of Governor Towner. The Free Federation of Workingmen asks that the island be put under the Department of the Interior. The nationalist movement sees the only chance for salvation in complete independence. The "Alliance," compromising between the statehood ideal of the Republicans and the modified independence platform of the Unionists, while declaring for "sovereignty within the sovereignty of the United States," has limited its ambition to obtaining the right for Porto Rico to elect its own governor. This means that the "Alliance," which holds all but four seats in the Legislature, would control the governor and all government appointments so long as it could maintain its political domination of the island. But the "Alliance" is finding out that its supremacy alone is not the cure-all that it pictured to the voters a year ago. It had a scare when, on October 30, in the midst of the opposition to its sales-tax law, a new party was launched by the big agricultural interests combined with the Chamber of Commerce. Much disturbance was observable in "Alliance" circles until November 5, when, after a secret conference between the leaders of the new movement and the "Alliance" heads, it was announced that "the interview ended amid the greatest harmony and cordiality."

TO PRINCETON UNIVERSITY and especially to Lewis Fox, a Princeton senior, goes the credit for initiating what we think was the most completely representative student conference ever held in America. Everybody knows that the delegates from some 250 colleges and universities came primarily to discuss the World Court. Their action as well as the votes in the colleges where a campaign had previously been conducted by an able committee of the Student Christian Association showed an overwhelming sentiment for joining the court. What pleased us about this discussion in the colleges, and more especially at Princeton, was that even the advocates of the court did not claim that by so cheap a price as joining it could America purchase the costly gift of peace. This note of sober realism even in propaganda is all too new in America. The students' fear of one-sided statements was well shown at Princeton where pains were taken to present many sides of the peace problem. The World Court issue itself was publicly debated by Senator Lenroot and Clarence Darrow, and in the discussion groups problems of armament, imperialism, the effect of the Locarno treaties, etc., were frankly faced. The students weren't afraid even to have a Socialist among the eminently respectable leaders of their discussion of world affairs.

THAT AMERICAN STUDENTS want to keep on talking over their own problems as students and as citizens was proved by their action at Princeton in forming a national federation. Usually we feel like applying birth control or even infanticide to new organizations in a world overpopulated by them. But this organization commends itself to us both by its purpose and the spirit and intelligence of its founders. They want to promote friendship with students of other lands but do not dream of importing a foreign youth movement ready-made to this country. They proved themselves sincere in wanting to break down the racial prejudices that lead to war by beginning at home. They elected Miss Holloway, an able Negro student from Howard University, to their executive committee. And the significant thing is not that there was some Southern opposition to this election but that there was much Southern support of it. Finally, by seating Felix Cohen of the College of the City of New York, the students showed courteously but firmly that their organization was to represent students and not faculties. Whatever its future, the new federation has begun well.

WHILE WE WILL not go so far as to say that the wishes of the students should be decisive in determining what should be required in an educational course, we do feel that such opinion is entitled to much weight. When that opinion has been expressed by a vote of 2,092 to 345, as in the referendum of the College of the City of New York against compulsory military training, the reason for heeding it becomes the more impressive. Yet the faculty of this college has voted to retain compulsory drill with only one professor, Morris R. Cohen, taking a public stand on the other side. This attitude, as we have previously suggested, is probably due as much to fear—fear for their jobs, fear for city appropriations—as to personal belief. Hope, therefore, rests in the students alone. We trust they will not flag. We want to see them carry out the proposal for a referendum among their parents, which we believe will not vary greatly from that among the students.

In addition we hope the students will put up a continuing, earnest, and aggressive fight upon compulsory soldiering. If the older men responsible for the conduct of the College of the City of New York are so devoted to war, let them have it a plenty.

GOVERNOR WALKER OF GEORGIA is publicly exulting over Governor Silzer of New Jersey, and he is well entitled to do so. Two years ago there was arrested in New Jersey Silas Parmore, a Negro fugitive from Georgia, against whom a charge of murder had been laid. Declaring that he would be given over to a mob if he were returned to Georgia, he fought extradition, and Governor Silzer was sufficiently impressed by his argument to warn the authorities in Georgia that Parmore must have a fair trial or no other fugitive would be returned from New Jersey under his administration. Now Governor Walker writes that he is sure that Governor Silzer will be "pleased to receive official notice that Silas Parmore has been tried by a jury in Georgia, given a fair and impartial trial, and found not guilty by a jury of twelve white south Georgia citizens." Governor Walker insists that "the State of Georgia and its people are no worse than those of other States." We are happy to record this incident as proof of the improvement of the administration of justice in the South and to express the hope that before long the Governor of Georgia and all the Southern executives will be able to report not only the acquittal of innocent Negroes but their acquittal by a jury of their peers, as required by the Constitution. A Negro should have the right to trial by a mixed jury, at least, and should not always face one of white men. We are happy to add that in three cases of alleged criminal assault on white women in North Carolina that State admirably protected the accused from mobs, proved that one Negro was entirely innocent of the charge, and that another was guilty of simple assault, while the third has been sentenced to death by regular procedure.

NO SOONER do President Coolidge and the Morrow commission assure us that all is well with aviation and that we are leading the world, or at least just as well off in material and personnel proportionately as any other country, than there comes a report of a House of Representatives special committee headed by Mr. Lampert to declare that "an alarming situation still exists in the army and navy air services." Taking direct issue with the President, the committee declares that we rank "not higher than third nor lower than fifth among the nations of the world" and it asserts that although more than $40,000,000 has been spent in the improvement of the service it has deteriorated in both morale and equipment. What shall the layman think? What shall the public say? We have had now three reports by committees or commissions and we have the testimony brought out before the Shenandoah inquiry and the Mitchell court martial. They present a mass of contradictory and directly diverging statements. We ourselves are of the opinion that neither the army nor the navy will ever make a go of aviation. They will do stunt flying well, but when it comes to developing the science of aviation they will always be throttled by the conservatism and red tape of the bureaucrats who invariably control both army and navy. To stop a frightful waste of money the people ought to ask for the abolition of military and naval aviation altogether.

THE NEW YORK HISTORICAL SOCIETY has wisely bestowed upon I. N. Phelps Stokes the first gold medal it has ever awarded, besides holding a public reception in his honor. For Mr. Stokes has just published in five thick volumes his extraordinarily valuable iconographic history of Manhattan Island. During the last fourteen years he has spent much time and money in recording the life of New York City not only in the form of a diary of the important happenings in the rise of the metropolis but in the presentation of a mass of material, notably maps and illustrations, all recorded with unquenchable enthusiasm, the passion of the collector of ancient things, the judgment of the detached historian, and the skill of the scholar. But this is only one of Mr. Stokes's notable services. When the State Library at Albany was largely destroyed by fire Mr. Stokes headed a group to rescue what was left of the manuscripts. From the Governor he obtained guards and helpers. As the present State historian relates it:

> For two days he directed the work and thus saved priceless treasures. Twice during the first day of rescue work Mr. Stokes was carried from the manuscript room, unconscious from the smoke, and each time upon reviving he insisted upon returning. Like a gallant officer he led his forces, under hopeless odds, against the enemy—fire, water, wind, smoke, and ice—and saved 80,000 manuscripts together with George Washington's fire-scarred sword.

All of which achievements Mr. Stokes has done his best to hide with a cloak of modesty.

THE WALT WHITMAN exhibition at the New York Public Library is striking evidence that the "good gray poet" has at last achieved in America the particular sort of eminence which leads to public monuments and to recognition by institutions. The cases of editions, manuscripts, translations, and mementos assembled at this exhibition are indeed so numerous and so full that Whitman might seem for the moment to have attained a position high enough to be unassailable. But the assaults have not ceased; the Whitman war still rages. Last week we commented upon an article wherein Ernest Boyd charges Whitman with having debauched a literary generation in Europe and America. Now comes a copy of the Americana Collector, the first item in which is an open letter to the trustees of the New York Public Library, insisting upon the "untimeliness" of the exhibition. It is untimely, says the author, Charles F. Heartman, because the world in general has yet to learn that the poet was not good even if he was gray. When the world becomes aware that the author of "Calamus" was abnormal, Mr. Heartman implies, it will cease to read him; and he quotes with approval the librarian of "an Eastern college" who testified "that students who asked for Whitman's books always received a privatissima. After being thus enlightened most of them don't care any more to read the books." In other words, the "good gray poet" stands ready to debauch mankind. We had not been informed that certain natural enough suspicions as to Whitman's private character had been scientifically confirmed. And even if they had, we are forced to wonder how long any artist would have to wait for his fame if that fame depended upon a clean bill of moral health. Shall we stop reading Shakespeare until we know for sure whether or not the sonnets were written to a man? Must those who have read Freud on Leonardo da Vinci henceforth forswear The Virgin of the Rocks?

War Claims and National Honor

AGAIN has Senator Borah scored heavily. The plan recently announced by the Administration providing for the return of the sequestrated alien property and the payment of American claims is the direct result of the movement, initiated by Senator Borah and his supporters, for the disposition of one of the most deplorable legacies of the war. Secretary Mellon's belated acceptance of the doctrine he now announces that "As a matter of broad national policy it is believed the United States should recognize the property rights of private individuals even though we were at war with their country, and not use this private property of nationals to pay claims against their nation," is a tribute to the soundness of view and judgment of those who, like The Nation, have given expression ever since 1918 to this self-evident truth.

It will be recalled that the most solemn promises were made in 1917 that the sequestrated property would be returned at the end of the war. The overwhelming victory, however, impaired the national morality and, having the power to be as lawless as it chose, the Administration simply changed its mind. The Knox-Porter resolution contained a provision to the effect that we might "retain" the sequestrated property until Germany made "suitable provision for the satisfaction of" the claims of American citizens.

The present Administration plan provides for the return of the property in kind amounting to some $150,000,000; for the $150,000,000 of seized cash the owners are required "voluntarily" to accept $50,000,000 in bonds and $100,000,000 in cash. The owners of the ships seized in American harbors at the outbreak of war and of radios and patents used by the United States are to receive "fair and reasonable compensation," not to exceed $100,000,000 in bonds, an ambiguity presently to be discussed. The claims of American citizens against Germany, estimated, including interest to 1926, at $180,000,000, will be paid by $80,000,000 in cash and $100,000,000 in bonds. To make up the $80,000,000, $31,000,000 of undistributed interest, accumulated on alien property funds down to March 4, 1923, will be used, together with the $50,000,000 of alien property cash for which the owners must "voluntarily" agree to take bonds.

The $250,000,000 worth of bonds provided for in the plan, and distributed as mentioned above, are to be issued by a trustee or trust company and to run for twenty-five years at 5 per cent interest, guaranteed by the United States. Principal and interest are to be payable in marks or dollars, at the option of the United States. They are to be served in first instance by the receipts coming to the United States from the Dawes Plan, under the head both of Rhine army costs and claims, as allocated under the Paris agreement of January, 1925. For the Rhine army costs priority payments are to be made to the United States amounting to $13,000,000 per year, of which one year's instalment has already been paid. Under the head of claims we are to receive 2¼ per cent of the German payments, not exceeding $10,000,000 per year, with no priority.

The crux of the solution lies in the acquiescence of the Administration to devoting Rhine army costs to the payment of claims of American citizens. This was proper for two reasons: first, because those costs would have had to be borne by the United States in any event, and secondly, because the naivete of the Wilson and Harding administrations permitted the Allies to embezzle these funds, about $250,000,000, after Germany had paid the amount to the Reparation Commission for our account. When Washington woke up to the facts and demanded our quota, Poincaré calmly informed the Department of State that the money had been spent and that we were privileged to ask Germany for it a second time. We lamely took the advice; hence the Wadsworth agreement of 1923, providing for the reimbursement of the United States from future German payments, which, in turn, gave way to the Paris agreement of 1925 under the Dawes Plan. For the claims proper, the Allies at Paris in 1925 generously let us have 2¼ per cent of the German payments, which it was known was quite insufficient. Again the ineptitude of the Administration brought about a diplomatic defeat. The British and French governments to the last hoped to force us into a policy of confiscation, and none more than they will regret that we have manifested a partial respect for the principle of immunity of private property, the gross violation of which by those nations is likely to cost them heavily in the future. The effort to escape the charge of confiscation by alleging that Germany is obligated to compensate its expropriated nationals only adds the immorality of hypocrisy to the offense of theft.

It was, therefore, only proper that the United States Government, which was responsible for the short-changing received at the hands of the Allies, should itself bear the risks of the Dawes Plan and should not penalize for its own shortcomings the owners of the sequestrated property or, indeed, the American claimants against Germany. Hence the provision for guaranteed bonds to be served out of the Dawes Plan payments. The American claims of $180,000,000 include $2,500,000 for Lusitania victims, about $15,000,000 for requisitions, about $25,000,000 for private debts and estate claims based practically on the depreciation of the mark, and about $60,000,000 for marine insurance companies.

The Mellon plan of settlement warrants certain comments. The $31,000,000 of undistributed interest belong not only to Germans but to American citizens and others whose property was seized and later returned, yet who were victims of the unjust rule that the Government does not pay interest on its obligations unless the law especially so provides. While it would be extremely difficult to allocate the sum, it would probably not be impossible. Again, it is extraordinary that provision should be made for "fair and reasonable compensation" to German shipowners, owners of radio stations and patents expropriated by the Government, yet that the liability should be limited to a specific total sum, $100,000,000. It is known that these assets were worth immeasurably more; $100,000,000 is therefore neither "fair" nor "reasonable." If the United States is liable, it is liable for the real value of the expropriated property and not for an arbitrary, fictitious value set in advance by the taker alone.

Again, it is understood that as a condition of receiving so much of their property back the German owners had to waive all claims for the devastation wrought upon it by the overzealous and destructive policies of A. Mitchell Palmer and Francis P. Garvan, Alien Property Custodians. This demand is unworthy of the United States and amounts to a partial confiscation. Senator Borah should not let it pass.

But on the whole the plan of settlement is to be welcomed, although it contains defects which should be corrected in Congress. It may cost the United States little. Whatever it costs it will be a cheap price to pay for rescuing us from a horrible mistake of policy and for restoring in some measure the national tradition and international law.

Rum, Radicalism, and Rebellion

DISPATCHES from Ohio report a dark brew of rum and radicalism at the State University. The students are being corrupted with liquor at their fraternity dances and with communism in the classroom. So, at least, the Governor of the State has learned from a report made by Assistant Prohibition Commissioner Probst after a raid in which he discovered a quart of whiskey and the paraphernalia for making more in the home of Dabney Horton, a member of the English Department.

Doubtless this agent of law and virtue found what he says he found. Doubtless if he looks further he will find more. Doubtless if an honest census were taken, even among college professors, the proportion of 100 per cent law-upholders would be modest. We are only mildly interested in the evidence of Mr. Horton's success as a home brewer and distiller. What interests us is this alleged union of rum and radicalism. Mr. Horton, says Assistant Commissioner Probst, "is of the parlor socialist type and has written for communistic papers." He even forfeited his citizenship during the war and became a citizen of France. "The professor and his wife do not have a perspective that will make them good American citizens. The professor himself is of the dangerous type that is wrecking Europe." Well, of course, Mr. Horton did assist more or less in the wrecking of Europe, and he did lose his citizenship. He went to France a couple of years before the rest of the United States army, joined the Lafayette Escadrille, and fought in the war—necessarily as a citizen of France. But after the war was over he retired from the wrecking business, and when he was invited to fly over the villages of the Riff with a little group of American bombers he declined; his regrets were expressed in language both picturesque and forcible in an article in The Nation for October 7 (doubtless the "communistic" paper referred to by Mr. Probst).

But Mr. Horton is not only a home brewer and a parlor pink. He is, says Mr. Probst, "an esthete as well," and this, in the Assistant Commissioner's bright lexicon, is pretty nearly the same thing. Mr. Probst exposes some examples of Mr. Horton's poetry as evidence against him. He reports that when he raided the Horton home he was entertained with verses by this "dangerous" character which he quotes for the enlightenment of the Governor:

> Sniff! sniff! There's a wolf at the door.
> Since the first of the month he's been sniffing about
> And glaring so fiercely we dare not go out.
> What can we give him to drive him away,
> With bills and the wolf and the devil to pay?
> Sniff! sniff! The wolf's at the door.
> It's the boy with the bill from the grocery store.

Nor is Mr. Probst content with this damaging evidence against Mr. Horton. He goes further:

> It seems that the idea of being a violator of the Constitution of our country had not dawned upon him. Laws were made for the coarse and common and not for him. Like a humming bird coming to the rose for a sip of nectar, he descended from his intellectual realm to the moonshine still for a sip of rum and became entangled in the meshes of the law.

And so Mr. Horton, Bolshevik, scofflaw, humming bird—and incidentally a gifted teacher—has been suspended from the faculty of Ohio State University, and the Governor is instituting a probe of lawless practices in clubs and professors' houses and of radical teaching in the classrooms.

We are impressed by the keen sensibilities of the prohibition enforcers of Ohio who not only detect forbidden aromas in cellars of private homes, but also the traces of radical ideas in private minds. And we wonder, unjustly perhaps, whether that little still would ever have been discovered in Mr. Horton's house if he had not been known to write for "communistic journals" and to question the propriety of bombing small nations.

Mr. Coolidge Beguiles the Farmer

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE is stronger on economy than in economics. When he talks "tariff," its splendors so dazzle him that consistency and logic are obscured and statistics take an Einstein curve instead of a straight line. In his annual message to Congress the tariff is the one thing about which nothing is said, presumably for the reason that he stands pat on that perfect instrument, the Fordney tariff, and because he had discussed the topic of agriculture and the relation of the tariff to farmers in his address before the American Farm Bureau Federation at Chicago on the Monday preceding.

In his Chicago address the President presented a flattering and optimistic picture of modern American agriculture in contrast with the agriculture of the past and in other countries. It is largely justified, though such a fact as the larger yield of wheat per acre in the closer cultivation of European countries detracts somewhat from our self-satisfaction. He then repeated, with straightforward candor, his opposition to nostrums for the cure of present ills through governmental intervention, and announced his worthy program for promoting cooperative marketing and other independent methods of making the most of our farming facilities. In blind contradiction to the principles of non-interference which he thus enunciated, he then proceeded to prove to the assembled farmers that the tariff is an unmitigated blessing for them and that it is not they but the industrial and city population that pays the tariff bills.

As they listened to the President there must have been a puzzled look on the faces of those members of the American Farm Bureau Federation who had read in its Weekly News Letter of January 11, 1923, the report of its Department of Research on what the American farmer gains and loses by the tariff. By an ingenious, if not ingenuous, argument, which it is difficult to follow, the President reached the remarkable conclusion that our farmers are taxed by the tariff in net result not more than 1 1/3 per cent of their expenditures. The Farm Bureau experts figure somewhat differently. To the full extent of the duties the gain to agriculture would be $124,800,000, of which sugar accounts for $45,800,000, wool $37,500,000, tobacco $10,000,000, and wheat and all other cereals together but $11,000,000. Thus any possible gain by tariff-heightened prices affects, as in other industries, special States or classes only: Louisiana and the beet-sugar interests, Ohio and Texas and the rangers in the mountain States who seek the use of our national forests for grazing, and certain New England and Southern States growing tobacco, while the whole body of the people as consumers, by the same reckoning, are mulcted $391,700,000 and the farmers as consumers $94,900,000, for the benefit of the special agricultural classes named—these figures referring to farm products only. The same experts figure that the tariff on all dutiable imports increases prices thereon $1,715,000,000, of which the farmers pay $426,000,000—figures which contrast rather startlingly with the President's.

The economic confusion in Mr. Coolidge's argument comes from the too usual ignoring of "the forgotten man," the farmer as consumer of all products, while the "protection" benefits, so far as there are such, are gained only by special classes, whether among farmers or the general community. It has been a leading argument in favor of the tariff that the wage-earners are the chief beneficiaries, but the President incidentally asserted that the industrial and city population bear the burden of tariff duties. He declared also that the labor and service which the farmers buy are untaxed, ignoring the fact that those who serve pay taxes indirectly in the cost of living.

That all is not happy in the field of "protection" may be illustrated by some detailed facts. The textile industries, with the highest protective duties, are in so bad a way that their official spokesman, confessing that they pay the lowest wages of any American industry, appeals for still higher duties, while the Carded Woolen Manufacturers Association makes complaint that the specific duties on wool, reaching 191 per cent ad valorem on the cheaper wools, are ruinous to the business, and the president of the American Federation of Labor serves notice that if the decreases of wages, which have produced so many strikes, are not ended, the A. F. of L. will ask for a reduction of the duties on woolens. The fact is that the "pyramiding" of duties from those on wool to those on woolens has made clothing, blankets, and the like, which the farmer and the rest of us must buy, so high in price that we are wearing our old things and giving the woolen mills orders for only 60-70 per cent of their capacity, whereas they claim they must increase their output by 15 to 20 per cent to give a fair return. And every housewife, in the farmhouse as well as the city home, who uses aluminum utensils must pay the 80 per-cent duty on kitchen ware which favors the Mellon aluminum trust, officially declared to be a law-breaker.

Finally, the President enumerated the articles on the free list for the special benefit of the farmer, including farm machinery, in which we excel the world, and gasoline, which we sell to the world, so that a duty would be as delusive as the duty on wheat and other farm products, the chief use of which is to fool the farmer politically.

The Menace of Education

OUT in Hawaii there is a man who understands the menace of education. His name is John Hind and, retiring as president of the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association, he discussed the labor problem, the tariff, soil conditions, taxation, and education. People, he said, were getting too much education, and it was a mistake to let teachers instead of business men plan the courses of study. We quote from the text of his address, as reprinted in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin:

> Why blindly continue [he asks] a ruinous system that keeps a boy or girl in school at the taxpayers' expense long after they have mastered more than sufficient learning for all ordinary purposes, simply to enlighten them on subjects of questionable value. . . .
> The present elaborate and idealistic school system . . . will in the end, I fear, produce a generation of impractical men and women who, believing . . . manual labor is beneath them, will bring about a condition of stunted or retarded development under which it may be found impossible to raise but a fraction of the amount of taxes which we are today called upon to pay. . . .
> The solution, as I see it, is that the taxpayer be relieved of further responsibility after the pupil has mastered the sixth grade, or possibly the eighth grade in a modified form.

To effect the necessary change, Mr. Hind feels, will require the cooperation of "some of our practical conservative business men" where hitherto we have trusted to mere educators who "by their training and devotion to learning have become unduly idealistic and hence extravagant." Education must be looked upon "in the light of a business matter."

This is an excrescence of Coolidge-economy philosophy which we may expect to see break out elsewhere than in the cane-fields of the mid-Pacific. Mr. Hind is concerned with two things—low taxes and cheap labor, wherein he resembles many of the props of the republic on the mainland, and his logic is far better than his grammar. The present American system of giving every child as much schooling as he will swallow is costly; and it produces young men and women who do not care to work, either on sugar plantations or in steel mills, for twelve hours a day. Elsewhere in his address Mr. Hind praises the Hawaiian bureau of labor for its success in importing, during a recent strike, large numbers of Filipino laborers whose standard of living was still lower than that prevailing in the gardens of Eden (as the tourist literature describes them) about Mauna Loa.

Whatever its other faults, American education cannot be accused of fostering a soporific contentment with plain living. The product of the American public school wants a telephone, a Ford car, and a radio set, and he expects his education to enable him to earn them. Mr. Hind will have to pay more than a dollar a day for sugar workers if he is to hire public-school graduates; and if our present immigration policy continues there will soon be none but public-school graduates to hire.

Education—even pretty poor and formalistic education—undoubtedly does produce, as Mr. Hind says, "visionary highbrows" who are not content to work as their fathers worked. It creates discontent. If the half-baked schoolboys of China had known either more or less they would never have awakened a sleeping continent. In Pittsburgh, Oahu, and Shanghai a little knowledge is still a dangerous thing. Fortunately.

Lafayette, We Want Our Money

By ALLEN S. OLMSTED, 2nd

THE man on Main Street (and his representative on Pennsylvania Avenue) seems to view the French debt like the five dollars he lent his brother-in-law several years ago. In the name of all that is good and solvent, why shouldn't it be repaid? It was a loan, not a gift. Folks that borrow ought to pay up, and everything else is bolshevism. Thus the man on Main Street.

To the Frenchman, it is not so simple. He never got any five dollars. Whatever he borrowed he immediately paid out again to American citizens for war supplies. Those American citizens made themselves rich selling the war supplies—so rich that they have to pay a surtax on their incomes. Those same citizens are now endeavoring to have the debt paid so as to reduce their surtaxes and thus further augment their profit. Hence the Frenchman sees the demand that the debt be paid as an effort to make the widow and children of the defender of Verdun pay for the uniform in which he was buried.

Such sentimentality is to be deplored. Business is business. To be sure the money was spent to weave horizon blue in Massachusetts woolen mills and the price was, to be sure, adequate. And it is doubtless true also that either the families of French veterans or the veterans themselves must pay most of the debt; for who else is there in France to pay taxes? The Frenchman's premise, therefore, may be true and his conclusion may follow from his premise; but we are a practical people and we do not like this sentimental manner of stating conclusions. It would be more businesslike to say that debts are debts and ought to be paid. In a business transaction there should be no sentiment.

Our relations with France were on a business basis. We were partners in a business venture. The object of the business was to defeat the German army. The mode of transacting that business was to discharge missiles from guns, and that required both missiles and men to shoot them. We furnished most of the missiles and the French most of the men. All of the missiles and many of the men were destroyed. We shall expect the French to pay for our missiles; as for their men, why— Oh, yes, their men, or at least the ones who weren't destroyed, are the ones who are to pay for the missiles.

When America joined the partnership in April, 1917, it was her effort to get the men and munitions to the line at the earliest date possible. The munitions got there about a year before the men. If the men had reached there as soon as the munitions, they could have fired the shells. In that case we would have paid for the shells and also for the white crosses and war-risk insurance of the men who were destroyed while shooting them. But our men did not get there so soon, and to our partners fell the job of repelling the enemy and of paying for the ammunition with which they did that job.

The writer was one of "our boys"—a member of an American regiment which operated light railways for the British army. On March 24, 1918, we ran a Baldwin locomotive off the track into a shell hole in order to keep the Germans from capturing and using it. That locomotive typifies the whole inter-Allied debt. Built at Eddystone, Pennsylvania, it was sold to the British Government at a price which afforded American workmen good wages and the Baldwin stockholders good dividends. The British Government "paid" for it out of money borrowed from the United States, which is another way of saying that the United States paid for the locomotives and the British Government promised to repay the American Government. The American Government had itself borrowed the money from certain of its citizens, and it is at this minute taxing those citizens and others, including me, to pay interest on the money borrowed. It says to the British Government: "Come, now, remember your promise. Tax your citizens more in order that we may tax our citizens less. For so it was agreed."

Yes, it was so agreed, and the net effect of the agreement is that the survivors of the British Third Army are being taxed more in order that we, who were attached to that army, should be taxed less. We are dunning them to pay for the locomotive we dumped into the shell hole. It sounds absurd; it is absurd; and to one who recalls the circumstances of that terrible night in March, 1918, it also seems shabby. But pass the shabbiness. When the reason has been found why my British companions in the flight from the Somme should be taxing themselves to pay me interest on the cost of the locomotive we both abandoned, the reason will also be apparent why the children and the grandchildren of those soldiers should tax themselves to pay the interest on the same locomotive to my children and grandchildren.

That reason is short and simple: it was so agreed. If the French debt is funded to extend over sixty-two years, as the British and Italian debts have been, the grandchildren of Joffre's army will be paying the grandchildren of Pershing's army, not because there is a good reason why they should pay, but because Clemenceau and Caillaux promised Wilson and Mellon that they would pay. For such is the law; what governments promise, their citizens unto the third and fourth generations must do.

The law is in this respect based on a legal fiction. It decrees that what "France" borrowed in 1917, "France" is bound to repay sixty-two years later just as though the borrower of 1917 and the repayer of 1979 were identical. But how many of the French taxpayers of 1979 will have had anything to do with the contracting of the debt, or with the war for which it was contracted? As for the creditor nation, it has redrafted its immigration law so as to encourage immigration from those noble Nordics, our former enemies. There are already in this country many German soldiers and there will be many more. These Germans, and their children, are among those who are entitled to exact payments for the locomotive captured by the German army in 1918. Thus shall the "inter-Allied" debts be paid.

Right there is the difference between the inter-grandchildren-of-allies debt and the five dollars which the man on Main Street lent to his brother-in-law. In the man-to-man transaction there is no legal fiction to say that the borrower and his son are the same person, and any lawyer in Gopher Prairie will tell you that if the father dies without paying, you cannot collect the debt from the son. But international law is more severe. That is worth remembering. When we are asking the next generation of Frenchmen to pay the debt which international law places on them, we are asking them to pay a debt which neither the law of France nor the law of the United States would put on them if their fathers had borrowed in their personal rather than in their governmental capacity.

The legal fiction! I shall enter on no encomium upon it; it needs none. All modern business is built around the fiction that a corporation is a "person." The Supreme Court's power to nullify legislation springs from the fiction that the Constitution is the will of the people, more immediately and directly expressed than by an Act of Congress. The legal fiction was invented in an effort to reconcile justice with logic. When it ceases to do justice, it should cease to circulate as good fiction. We would do well to reconsider the fiction that "France" borrowed and "France" must pay in the light of whether it is either wise or just to require Frenchmen to pay money into the American Treasury.

Mr. Owen D. Young, in discussing inter-Allied debts, draws a picture of General Pershing returning to the tomb of Lafayette. He stands at attention, salutes, and declaims: "We are here, Lafayette; and this time we want our money."

Why drag Lafayette into it? Why not! Lafayette had as much to do with the lending of the money as did the people who will be asked to pay it back half a century hence.

Has the Negro the Right of Self-Defense?

By DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

FEW criminal cases have combined the dramatic intensity, the forensic brilliance, and the deep social significance present in the trial just concluded at Detroit of Dr. Ossian Sweet and ten other Negroes charged with the murder of a white man. For more than a month all the efforts of the prosecutor and the police were bent toward securing a verdict of life imprisonment from the white jury. Fighting for the right of the defendants and all other Negroes to defend themselves against assault was the ablest criminal advocate who ever faced an American jury, Clarence Darrow, and with him Arthur Garfield Hays of New York, Walter M. Nelson of Detroit, and Herbert Friedman of Chicago. The jury, after deliberating for forty-six hours, was unable to agree, and on November 27 was discharged. Perhaps it was only to be expected that there would be no agreement among twelve men selected at random from a community—or a nation for that matter—in which there is so little agreement upon the difficult problem really at the bottom of the case.

For this was no ordinary murder trial. Back of it all was the whole sensitive problem of race relations, intensified a thousand-fold by the recent Northern migration of the Negro; hovering over and touching the whole proceeding was the somber cloud of race prejudice.

If a crowd of Negroes had tried to drive a family of whites from their home in a Negro neighborhood and a Negro had been killed by shots from the house, it is difficult to imagine a prosecutor even making an arrest. The right to defend home and self is ancient and well-established; it has been honored for centuries by juries and courts. But suppose, as was the fact in this case, that the home is inhabited by Negroes, suppose the crowd is made up of white neighbors, angered by the undesired presence of the blacks—and fearful of a depreciation in real-estate values. Suppose while the white crowd is throwing stones and acting menacingly under the cover of approaching night a volley from the house kills a white man. Between these two cases the "law" makes no distinction, but it will be a very rare white jury that will be able or willing to see that the two situations are identical. It is a tribute to the capacity of Clarence Darrow to rouse the best in common men, and to the fairness of the extraordinary young judge who presided, that seven jurors held out for two days for acquittal and thus prevented their fellows from sending the defendants to the penitentiary.

The theory upon which the prosecution sought to send these eleven Negroes to prison for life—the extreme penalty in Michigan—is an interesting phase of this memorable case. No evidence of who fired the shot which killed Leon Breiner was available; he was struck by one bullet, whereas eight or ten were fired from within the house. It was therefore impossible to charge one defendant as the murderer and the others as co-principals, aiding and abetting. The charge of a conspiracy to kill would have been less severe than first-degree murder. The state accordingly charged each of the eleven with murder, alleging that all eleven acted under an agreement to kill anyone committing even the slightest trespass, regardless of the necessity for defense, so that each was equally responsible for the shooting done by one. No effort to prove such an agreement was made either by words or conduct, but the killing itself was regarded both as the crime and proof of the murderous agreement! Trade unionists who have suffered for generations by reason of the legal sleight-of-hand known as "conspiracy" will do well to keep their eyes upon this latest refinement upon that doctrine of oppression.

Proceeding upon this ingenious theory, the state, after proving that there was a killing, sought to anticipate and defeat the defendants' plea of self-defense. Witness after witness, chiefly white residents of the neighborhood, took the stand and insisted that the crowds which gathered about Dr. Sweet's home were small, orderly, and even "neighborly." Some were sorry spectacles under Darrow's pitiless cross-questioning and biting sarcasm, but for the most part they clung to the story that although it was necessary to have on duty sixteen policemen, in charge of a deputy chief, the neighborhood was a veritable vale of peace. One witness, asked by the prosecutor how many people he saw about the Sweet house, replied: "There was a great crowd . . . no, I won't say a great crowd . . . a large crowd . . . well, there were a few people there and the officers were keeping them moving." The cross-examination was illuminating:

Q. Have you talked to anyone about the case?

A. Lieutenant Johnson (the police detective in charge).

Q. And when you started to answer the question you forgot to say "a few people," didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Those state witnesses who could be induced to admit that stones had been thrown amused the courtroom by referring to them as "pebbles," the "pebbles" introduced into evidence being chunks of cement, some of them the size of one's fist. The testimony of the police detailed to guard the house corroborated that of the residents of the vicinity in every respect.

The defense first produced witnesses, most of them Negroes, who gave a wholly different picture of conditions just before the shooting—a picture of an angry, threatening crowd, determined "to run the niggers out." It was further established that shortly after Dr. Sweet's purchase of a house in this white neighborhood, some seven hundred residents of the vicinity held an overflow mass meeting, and organized an "Improvement Association." That the "improvement" intended was keeping Negroes out of the district was clear.

The principal defendant, Dr. Sweet, was put on the stand, and stated the circumstances surrounding the shooting, as they appeared from within the beleaguered house. He told of the crowds on September 8 when he moved in, of the police detailed because of the known temper of the vicinity, of the threats and the stoning, of the massing of the crowd, and of the shooting. Then followed one of the most remarkable direct examinations to be found in all the records of criminal cases: a vivid picture of the fear-ridden mind of a black man, terrified by a hostile crowd of whites outside his home. The testimony was particularly effective because it came from the lips of a highly educated man, a graduate of two universities, just returned from research in Vienna, and a skilled physician. To show that Dr. Sweet believed his life was in danger Mr. Hays questioned him upon his mental life and emotional experience in so far as they touched upon his fear of mob violence. The examination brought out that the witness had seen the brutalities of the Washington race riots, had read accounts of the Chicago cruelties, of those at East St. Louis, Tulsa, and Omaha. He had talked with Detroit Negroes who had been driven from their new homes by white neighbors: in one case a fellow-physician whose house but three months before had been sacked by a mob, and who had been forced to convey away his newly purchased home while policemen looked on approvingly. Much of his information concerning the way his people had been abused and tyrannized by whites came from a reading of The Nation, and a number of issues were introduced into evidence. Thus the whole sordid panorama of bestiality was unrolled before the jury, in an effort to convey to the white men an understanding of the fear that gripped those eleven barricaded blacks. When finally the witness was asked his state of mind at the time of the shooting, he answered:

> When I opened the door I saw the mob and I realized . . . I was facing that same mob that has hounded my people throughout its entire history. . . . I was filled with a fear that only one could experience who knows the history and the sufferings of my race.

The climax of the trial was reached when Clarence Darrow walked slowly to the jury box and began his closing argument. A deep silence fell over the crowded noisy courtroom. The old man with the unutterably sad face and the great stooped shoulders seemed no mere lawyer pleading for hire. He seemed, instead, a patriarch out of another age, counseling his children, sorrowing because of their cruelty and hatred, yet too wise in the ways of men to condemn them for it. His voice was a low rumble; in it resounded all the misery his tired eyes had seen. Quietly and sadly he besought these twelve men to inflict no further hatred and injustice upon a race that has known nothing but hatred and injustice. He seemed to be pleading more that the white man might be just than that the black be free, more for the spirit of the master than the body of the slave. As his voice rumbled out the story of this yesterday's tragedy of race, the whole drama of the black man in America seemed to be there reenacted.

And then suddenly the voice of the lawyer rang out like a brass gong, his eyes became hard and grim, every muscle of his huge body was tense and strained. Darrow was no longer the patriarch, the philosopher. Now he had become the warrior, the veteran of a hundred battles for human freedom—battles against the greed of the strong, the cruelty of the many, the bigotry of the ignorant. Thoroughly aroused and angered, his head lowered like a fighter coming out of his corner, he turned upon the prosecutors, his arms swinging, eyes narrowed and pitiless, the brass gong clanging an alarm and a challenge. . . . John Brown before the Arsenal at Harper's Ferry. Owen Lovejoy defying the mob at Alton. Charles Sumner scourging Butler in the Senate Chamber. . . . In the veins of Darrow is the blood of the Abolitionists: his father was a friend of John Brown and sent more than one fleeing black man along his terrified way to Canada and freedom; again and again he had told the son tales of Garrison and Kelley and Foster and Pillsbury.

The black man's body had been freed, and the Abolitionist father had helped win him that freedom. There are no more underground railroads or fugitive-slave laws or whipping-posts. But there are mobs and torches and trees hideous with swinging black shapes, and there is suspicion, prejudice, hatred. And on the new battlefield, fighting a subtler foe, and one that may perhaps never be wholly defeated, is Clarence Darrow, son of the Abolitionists.

The story told in that courtroom was undoubtedly a sordid and disheartening one, but not wholly so. Has the white man of today advanced beyond his brother of two hundred years ago who traded slaves for rum? No one can answer with any assurance. But that the black man is making headway is clear beyond doubt. Of this, the young defendants themselves are striking evidence. Most of them are either graduates or students of colleges or professional schools; their grandparents were slaves who could neither read nor write! At the press table sat two colored newspaper men the match of any correspondent there. The factories seen from the courtroom windows are employing more and more Negroes every week. And there is encouragement, too, in the fact that Negroes can command so fair a trial in a land where most trials of Negroes have been mob-dominated travesties. For this trial was probably the fairest ever accorded a Negro in this country; had it been otherwise the defendants would now be on their way to a life in prison.

The World Court—A Reply

By MANLEY O. HUDSON

THE advocates of America's giving its support to the World Court are now legion. For five years the question has been facing us, and for almost three years the proposal of American adhesion to the Court Protocol has been pending. During this period a great deal has been written on the subject. Many debates have been held. Students, lawyers, politicians have studied the question. From hundreds of platforms it has been explained and expounded. Public hearings have been conducted by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs. And one might think that as a result the subject has been pretty thoroughly explored. In particular, the relation between the Court and the League, which was an object of attack in 1923, has been very fully considered.

But suddenly, on the eve of the debate in the Senate, we are told that we have all overlooked something very important. Mr. James N. Rosenberg, who describes himself as "an enthusiast for a world court," whatever that may be, tells us in The Nation of December 2, 1925, that we have all overlooked Article 13 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. He has been reading the Covenant of the League of Nations and he discovers there provisions by which members of the League of Nations have obligated themselves to carry out in good faith the decisions of the Court, and have agreed that in case of their failure to do so the Council of the League may propose what steps should be taken to give effect to the decision. He addresses to me the question whether my own statement on the connection between the Court and the League is not incomplete.

I would first suggest to Mr. Rosenberg that he read the Protocol of Signature and the adjoined Statute of the Court. He asks the question, to which he assumes an affirmative answer: "Is not the World Court established pursuant to the Covenant of the League of Nations?" Just what he means by "pursuant" I do not quite know. Pursuant in point of time? The clear answer is, Yes. The Covenant was in force a whole year and more before the Court was established. Pursuant in any other sense? The clear answer is, No. Mr. Rosenberg says the Court was "created to carry out the provisions" of Article 13 of the Covenant. He cannot have read the Court's Statute very far, for the very opening words in Article 1 are: "A Permanent Court of International Justice is hereby established, in accordance with Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations." If this has the effect of incorporating into the Statute some provisions of Article 14, a question about which I have written at length, it does not similarly incorporate the provisions of Articles 13 and 16 to which Mr. Rosenberg refers. Nor is there any other part of the Statute which has that effect. So that I submit that Mr. Rosenberg's entire argument is based on a misconception. The Court was established "pursuant to," or as the Statute more accurately says "in accordance with," Article 14 of the Covenant and not pursuant to Article 13, nor "pursuant to the Covenant" as a whole.

But I must deal also with the bugaboo of "the army [illegible] the World Court." Mr. [illegible]'s argument might have been stated to run as follows: The United States is asked to join with other nations in maintaining the World Court. The other nations to date, though this may not always be so, are all members of the League of Nations. By provisions in the Covenant of the League binding on them but in no way binding on the United States even after the United States gives its support to the World Court, these other nations are bound to submit to arbitration or judicial settlement such disputes as they themselves recognize at the time to be suitable for such submission; and when they do submit a case to the World Court they agree to carry out the decision and not to resort to war against any other member of the League which does carry it out. If any member fails to carry out a decision, the Council of the League "shall propose what steps shall be taken to give effect" to it; and if any member goes to war against another member which does comply with the decision, then it is to be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League which undertake to apply certain economic sanctions.

Now these obligations exist only because of the Covenant, and they would not be undertaken by the United States in giving its support to the World Court. The Covenant is one instrument, the Court Protocol and adjoined Statute are another. The United States will not become a party to the former by adhering to the latter. Mr. Rosenberg calls them Siamese twins. If that is an apt description while all parties to one are also parties to the other, which I do not admit, it will cease to be so when the United States becomes a party to one without becoming a party to the other. We shall cut the cord!

But there is one more string to Mr. Rosenberg's bow as he ought to use it. He may object to our joining in maintaining a Court with other nations which are bound among themselves by such obligations. What is the alternative? He says it is "a court of justice, backed not by arms but only by acquiescence and a decent respect for the opinion of mankind." Now suppose we should say to the other nations: Scrap the World Court; forget what you have builded during the last five years while we in America were debating; throw away the eighteen opinions which the World Court has handed down; send the judges back to their homes; and come to a conference in Washington where we shall set up a "real" world court according to American ideas which you will accept as we lay them out to you. And, if the limit of supposing has not been reached, suppose the other nations meekly agree and set up such a "real" world court. Then what will there be to prevent other states from getting together, perhaps at Locarno, and agreeing on precisely that procedure which the Covenant now lays down for preventing war in violation of the decisions of the new Court? Mr. Rosenberg might persuade our Secretary of State to call them naughty, but they could not be prevented—not unless America is to rule the world. For America, we may say that "acquiescence and a decent respect for the opinion of mankind" are the only sanctions we shall give to other nations or exact from them. We shall say this very clearly in adopting Mr. Hughes's "conditions and understandings." But we can hardly lay this down as mandatory for all the other peoples of the world. We might ask them to abolish the League of Nations as a condition of our supporting the World Court, but we cannot with very good grace ask them to agree not to set up another league among themselves after we have given our support.

Of course, the implication in Mr. Rosenberg's articles is that the United States would be assuming some great obligation in giving its support to the World Court. He calls it a "momentous step." The truth is that we should be assuming no obligation except that of paying our share of the expenses; and our own Congress will say what our share is. For it is not being proposed that the United States agree to take any case to the World Court, not even when in the words of Article 13 of the Covenant a dispute may arise which we "recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration or judicial settlement."

The Canadian Progressives Divide and Fall

By DOUGLAS MacKAY

Ottawa, Canada, December 7

THE Progressive-Agrarian movement in Canada rose in 1921 with a sweeping rush from the ruck of post-war politics and placed sixty-five members in a House of Commons of 235, eclipsing in number even the historic Conservative Party. Today the Progressive Party is slipping into oblivion; it emerged from the general election of October 29 with its representation reduced to twenty-four. In 1921 it was a national party; 1925 found it a prairie farmer group.

Yet, though its numbers are reduced its influence as a third party promises to be greater than ever before. The dying Progressive movement is in a position to sustain or defeat the minority Liberal Government on the floor of the House. The Liberal Party slightly lowered the tariff during four years in office, and so gained sufficient Progressive support to remain in power. Progressives justified this support by claiming to be an advanced wing of the Liberal Party, with free-trade tendencies.

Last October the Government met numerical defeat in the general election. The new House of Commons has 117 Conservatives, 100 Liberals, twenty-four Progressives, two Laborites, and one Independent member. (Ten new seats were added to the representation by the 1923 Redistribution Act.) While in a minority, the Liberal Government still clings to office, and Parliament is summoned. Rather than resign the Government is meeting the House in the hope of bringing the Progressives into the Liberal fold on a general policy of "anything to keep the Tories out of power." The Liberals must have the support of most of the Progressives on every government measure, or surrender office to the high-tariff Tories, whose position would be untenable in the face of two low-tariff groups in opposition. It is an acute case of minority, third-party government.

The weakness in the Progressive movement is internal. It is losing its foothold on that treacherous slope which all reform parties must climb to survive. The party has rejected national organization and is breaking up into personal units. Some of its members in Parliament should bear the Socialist label. Others believe in economic group representation; that is, that their movement should be farmers and farmers only. A few still cling to the ideals of the leaders of the party in 1921—that it would be national, and would embrace all who believed in low tariff, low freight rates, banking reform, and a railway outlet to Hudson Bay for Western Canada.

Hon. T. A. Crerar, former minister of agriculture in the Union (war-time) Government, was leader of the newborn party in 1921, and in the interest of the Progressive movement stumped Canada from coast to coast. There were 150 candidates in the field and every evidence of a lusty adolescence for the new party. In rural sections a general bolt from the old parties took place, and sixty-five members, inexperienced in the ways of parliament, appeared at the opening of the House of Commons in Ottawa in 1922. It was a remarkable showing for a new party without tradition or precedent, and with only high ideals of public life to guide it. There was no campaign fund except single-dollar subscriptions; thus the Progressive movement entered politics without the usual fetters.

Social Ottawa shuddered at the prospect of a deluge of farmers, but the Progressives acquitted themselves with dignity and modesty. There was no arrogance, but there was real sincerity and willingness to learn. The most notable characteristic was suspicion—a suspicion of plots to seduce their votes, or plots to break up their party. There was a questionable political morality, they said, about rigid party lines. These fears dulled the fighting edge of the party until the Alberta representatives, always more radical than the rest, broke into open revolt and began to assert themselves as a leaderless group in the House of Commons. Associated with them was Miss Agnes MacPhail, an Ontario school-teacher and the only woman member of the House of Commons. Miss MacPhail entered the Parliament of Canada as a stern crusader. Her continued fight for better conditions for rural living and for the abolition of cadet training in the public schools has not lessened, but her manner has mellowed and she has gained the respect of many people who formerly declared her to be an erratic radical.

As a party the Progressives injected new rules of conduct into the House of Commons. Its members were notably conscientious in their attendance in the House and vied with each other in voting at every division. The dilemma of extraparliamentary groups as to what to do in a House pledged to give or withhold support to party measures was solved. Only once was the dignity of Parliament ruffled (the Canadian Parliament is more dignified than Westminster itself) and that was when some Progressives appeared in shirt-sleeves one warm June day. The Canadian House will not likely see a group of such diversity again, unless at some future date the two Labor members succeed in expanding their numbers to 122. The party included five Progressives [illegible], as well as prohibitionists, grain growers, [illegible], and citizens of weekly papers. One-third of the members of the party in the House were born in Great Britain.

The revolt from within was fostered by several of the "British born" and was aimed partly at the leadership of the bloc. T. A. Crerar had been compelled to retire to devote his entire time to the United Grain Growers Company of Canada, of which he was president. He was succeeded by Robert Forke, a Scottish lowlander by birth and accent and a successful farmer of 1,600 acres in Manitoba. The native caution of Forke was too much for some of his younger followers, who broke away and were promptly given the unparliamentary title of "Ginger Group" by the press-gallery correspondents. So, for two sessions the Gingerites remained aloof from party caucus and led combative forays on their own account in the House. On major issues principle compelled them to vote with the whole agrarian group.

The revolt broke the back of the Progressive movement nationally. It had been fostered from Alberta, and Ontario resented it. The Progressives went into the 1925 election as a group of individuals and still with only single-dollar subscriptions for campaign funds. On the prairie there were small provincial organizations, but nothing resembling an effective machine. Robert Forke, the leader, confined himself in his campaigns to Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Old Ontario was recognized as lost to the Progressive movement and the leader of the party dared not go into Alberta, where the Ginger Group flourished.

In aiming for something higher the Progressives rejected the consolidating elements of the party system of organization. Crerar, the only experienced member of the group, had warned them in his parting message against disintegration. It was patronage, he told them, that had made the organizations of the older parties objectionable, and to survive the Progressive movement must organize on a national basis. But the warning went unheeded by the new members of Parliament, who felt secure in their seats and comfortable with their annual indemnity of $4,000.

The Progressives have come from the polls this time wounded and limping, but still with swords in hand. Whether or not they will offer their swords to the Liberals will be shown during the sessions of the fifteenth Parliament. Probably a few will continue to harry the Government by guerrilla tactics and call truce on major policies. The Government will absorb several Progressives whom the Liberal organization left unopposed at election time, and a handful of men, in reality Farmer-Socialists, will survive.

The dissatisfaction with the two old parties which gave the first vitality to the Progressive movement is far from dead, particularly in the three prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. Materially the Progressive experiment brought little to the West and the promises made by the older parties have begun to pall. A Western party, embracing city and country interests, is feeling its way to the light under the sound leadership of men whose names will command instant respect when the call is made for support. The leaders are working quietly and are willing to wait their opportunity.

Such a party would attract the enormous foreign-born population of the West as well as many of the British-born who are without Canadian party traditions. It would be a militant and aggressive force and would react in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces by stirring up demands there for geographical representation. These are the potential forces, rising from the collapse of the Progressive movement, which any administration must meet if the original confederation of nine provinces is to survive. Canada's geography is her most vital problem.

Soup, Soap, and Shoes

By STUART CHASE

> We have mastered the Coolidge-Mellon idea that the best way to help the poor is to lighten the tax on millionaires, and that heavy levies on the dead discourage thrift and industry. Now we are working hopefully on the thought that paying big taxes on everything we eat, drink, wear, burn, live in, ride in, and go to is really a blessing in disguise.

THUS Howard Brubaker in the New Yorker. The following is the story of a young man who has tried diligently, but somehow has not been able to achieve Mr. Brubaker's peace of mind.

Mr. Mellon began to emphasize his tax-reduction plan in the spring of 1924. The philanthropic appeal was contagious, the heart of the Harriman National Bank in New York was touched, and it proceeded to run advertisements in the newspapers where the message to the poor and the struggling was put in bold type. Correspondence was invited. The appeal caught the eye of William J. Halperin of Mount Vernon, New York, who had been exercising his ingenuity trying to attain the good life on a salary of $45 per week. It filled him with hope and cheer, but being a young man with an unfortunate thirst for knowledge he wanted to find out what made the wheels go round, and through what specific channels would these rewards and fairies come. So he wrote to the Harriman National Bank and said: "Tell me just how and in what way will I benefit by reduction of taxes with my salary at $45 a week. I should say that the average earnings of men, taking the country as a whole, would not exceed $45. In writing to the Senators from New York I would like to be in possession of some facts to enable me to present my arguments intelligently."

Mr. Phillips, vice-president of the bank, replied promptly. "The benefit to those who do not make an income-tax return by reason of limited income would lie in the reduced cost of living, for you must recognize that all business passes on its costs, which include taxation, to the consumer. Thus, although you made no tax return, you pay rent and your landlord pays income taxes, his taxes being passed on to you in the form of rent. The Mellon plan for tax reduction would result in increased prosperity for the United States, which we all would feel. We are confident that you will agree with this outline, and that you will be able to write your Senators accordingly."

But the confidence, alas, was premature. Mr. Halperin pondered on these broad but somewhat nebulously defined blessings, and then came back for more. Some months later he confessed his perplexities to Mr. Phillips in the following terms: "Since receiving your letter of May, 1924, my rent has been increased twice—$5 each time—and I have noticed no reduction in the cost of living. I am somewhat confused as to how these matters work out, and I am wondering if you can give me further information." To which Mr. Phillips replied: "It is unfortunate but true that large bodies move slowly, and, therefore, unhappily, tax reduction is not felt so promptly as we should like. Unquestionably, however, without the tax reduction which we have so far enjoyed your living expenses would be still higher than they have been, and I cannot see but that you have tax reduction to thank for this. With further tax reduction there must eventually come still further reduction in the cost of living. . . . The particular question of the increase in your rent appears to be a specialized matter." And Mr. Phillips, having prophesied that further tax reduction on the rich will give us more of the benefits which he admits we haven't got and somewhat pained by his unhappy choice of rent as an example, picks a new favorite in a pair of shoes. "You can readily see that if it costs the manufacturer less to produce a pair of shoes by reason of reduction of his taxes he can sell them for less, and, in fact, he must do so in the face of competition."

Still this deplorable youth isn't satisfied. He figures out the most he could expect on a pair of shoes (even if the manufacturer could shift an income tax, which he cannot) would be about 6 cents. As shoes are not bought in 6-cent units except at fire sales the reduction in price will be precisely nothing. And, he inquires, as to cans of soup and cakes of soap: Would the possible fraction of a cent saving in cost ever affect the retail price, or would it simply be salted down by the manufacturer?

Soup and soap appear to have been too much for Mr. Phillips; it was time to appeal to higher sources of inspiration. He refers Mr. Halperin to Mr. Hoover and is again—"confident that you will receive a satisfactory response." Mr. Halperin duly submits the correspondence to Mr. Hoover and is unkind enough to say: "Mr. Phillips has given me no definite reply to my definite inquiries—he has generalized. But apparently he believes that you will give me something more definite." But Mr. Hoover, being a wise man, turned the correspondence over to Mr. Garrard B. Winston, Under Secretary of the Treasury. Meanwhile Halperin wrote again to Phillips expressing his regret that the soup and the shoes and soap could not be settled between them. To which Phillips fires his parting shot and passes out of the picture. "It is difficult, perhaps impossible, for the general understanding to put these matters in a nutshell, but your interest in the matter prompts me to suggest that you go to the New York Library and make an earnest and sincere study of the whole subject." Why he did not warn Mr. Halperin to keep away from books which discussed the incidence of taxation is puzzling—but perhaps this distinction was rather fine and beyond Mr. Phillips.

We are now in the very bowels of the Treasury Department. Mr. Winston takes the matter firmly in hand. He sends Mr. Halperin a speech delivered by himself before the National Association of Credit Men, and he writes a two-page letter. He admits that there isn't much to hope from cakes of soap and cans of soup, but "if taxes are not economically sound in their nature, then in the long run they have a very material effect upon the cost of production and prices," for they will "drive capital into unproductive investment" and "check the initiative essential to business enterprise." Thus he shifts the ground to our old friend the quaking capitalist, who "leaves the country" at the drop of a hat, leaving starvation and desolation behind him. It appears we must reduce his taxes, not in the hope that he will lower his prices but in order to keep him from scuttling to Canada or Bolivia or Kamchatka.

At which point Mr. Halperin is sunk beyond all resuscitation, and there the matter rests. One doubts if even Mr. Mellon could have done much for him. The most conservative of economists would have told him, and told Mr. Phillips and Mr. Winston as well, that while taxes on sales may be passed on it is very difficult to shift income taxes to the consumer. A monopoly might do it, but if there is any competition in the premises, the so-called "marginal" company, which makes no profit at all, sets the price, and thus the income-tax factor simply cannot operate at all. Furthermore the Treasury bill has to do with taxes on individuals and not on corporations. Ninety per cent of American business is carried on under the corporate form—including shoes and soap and soup. Such individual proprietorships or partnerships as remain to be taxed on surplus earnings are all in competitive lines, amount to little, and cannot shift the burden. Lastly the picture of the quaking capitalist is totally irrelevant in an era where we have more money to invest than we know what to do with. Never has there been such a plethora of capital.

Income taxes on rich individuals stick to them. Because they cannot be shifted the rich individuals have yelled—understandable and human enough, if you please. If Mr. Mellon wants to help his friends, that's understandable too. But why all this labored nonsense to Mr. Halperin? Isn't there some danger that it will destroy the respect of every intelligent man for the intellects of our bank vice-presidents and our Under Secretaries of the Treasury?

The Holy Bonds

My bride presents me with a chart of gall and seems to doubt me and to meditate inviolacies her tears fail to recall.

She plans to promenade in grim attire while I exploit the offices of hate, and I shall keep still and regard the fire

My bride has issued from her private door and bursts into a cold inverted laugh, for she has found me humbled on the floor,
a sprig of ashes held between my teeth.
This she interprets as despair and chaff conceding to her shabby bridal wreath.

Chicherin and the Russian Debt

By PAXTON HIBBEN

SAID President Coolidge in his last message to Congress:

> The principal sums without interest, still pending, are the debts of . . . Russia, $192,000,000, which those at present in control have undertaken openly to repudiate.

Said Senator Borah in a statement published on December 14 in the New York World:

> I am in a position to state on the most authentic authority that in so far as concerns matters of debt, the confiscation of American property, and propaganda, Russia is ready and prepared to deal with these matters in the most reasonable and satisfactory way.

Testimony to this effect is available in the files of the State Department, a source of information which even the President might tap if he happened to be interested in the truth about Russia. It is a matter of record that several efforts have been made by "those at present in control" of the Soviet Government to reach a fair settlement of the debt question. Meanwhile bankers and business men are urging closer relations with Russia. A private and secret conference recently held at the Bankers Club in New York brought together an impressive group of powerful American financiers and the American representatives of Russian Government trading corporations to discuss problems of trade with the USSR. Curiously enough, news of this gathering came to the attention of the American press only through accounts published in Moscow. More recently Senator Borah has reintroduced his measure for the recognition of Russia and states that he intends to press it at this session.

I talked the whole matter over with Chicherin recently. In view of what he said it is, I think, quite plain that neither the debts of prerevolutionary Russia nor the claims of American citizens for damage to property in Russia during the Russian revolutions stand in the way of the resumption of normal relations between the United States and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

> Various Americans who have visited Moscow have insisted that the question of the prerevolutionary Russian debt is what holds back the reestablishment of normal relations between the United States and the USSR [Chicherin said]. I cannot believe that, however. President Coolidge waived consideration of the old Czarist debt in his message of December 9, 1923, and, anyhow, the whole sum involved, even if the Czarist debt were included, is so small in comparison with the ten billion dollars due the United States from other European countries—many of which hold out no prospect of being able to pay—that I cannot believe this would stand in the way at least of conversations as to the terms upon which the payment of such a sum could be undertaken by the USSR. We have always been ready to enter into discussions looking to a satisfactory practical settlement of the whole debt issue. We are now. Indeed we are negotiating with the French for the practical settlement of a debt issue involving a far more considerable sum than is involved between the United States and the USSR, and these negotiations are proceeding satisfactorily. Naturally, we feel that if we can come to a practical understanding with the French, we can with the United States, also.
> Indeed, I cannot help feeling that it would be still simpler with the United States, both because the amount involved is not large and because we now have very active commercial relations actually going on between the two countries. In fact, our largest imports are now from the United States, and there are scores of commercial representatives of the USSR coming and going constantly between Moscow and the United States, doing business with your cotton growers, textile and agricultural machinery manufacturers, and so on, on a basis of firm credits backed by some of your most conservative bankers. Your business men are realists who know well that we do business on a sound basis. They can give your government all the assurance required that we are also realists who meet practical problems in a practical way.

I asked Chicherin if the amount involved were really so small when the claims of various American corporations for damages suffered in Russia were considered.

> Relatively, yes [Chicherin replied]. Of course claims of that sort have to be pretty carefully scrutinized. The French, for example, started talking about six billion dollars. But when these figures were examined closely we got a figure in the neighborhood of $350,000,000 as a starting-point—which is less astronomic.
> Moreover, in the matter of individual claims, Mr. Hughes said on July 19, 1923, that the United States recognizes the right of revolution and does not attempt to determine the internal concerns of other states. The right of a government to proceed to measures of confiscation, where the welfare of the people of a country is at stake, has been clearly established by the United States in the adoption of the XIII and XVIII amendments to your Constitution. So that the principle involved in our action at the time of our revolution is not in question.
> Nevertheless, as a matter of practical adjustment, we have already reached satisfactory settlements with the citizens of other countries who claimed losses due to the revolution, and I have not the slightest doubt we could reach similar settlements with Americans.
> After all, the real crux of the matter is in whether or not we are a going concern, conducting business in a responsible way. Three years and a half ago Mr. Hughes put it that "the inescapable and ultimate question would appear to be the restoration of productivity in Russia. . . ." Well, we have pretty well done that. Both agriculture and industry in the USSR are already 71 per cent of prewar. And this has been accomplished not by foreign loans or mortgaging the natural wealth of the country, but by the hard work and solidarity of the workers and peasants of the USSR—which is, after all, a more reassuring foundation for enduring prosperity than foreign loans.
> Of course this recovery could be effected more rapidly and with greater advantage not only to our people but to your manufacturers and exporters were we in a position to secure the normal credits of any ordinary business transactions. For our foreign policy has been built upon two things: We have to have peace in order to develop our own system of life and government here and we have to have commercial relations with those who produce what we require for our development. For the past eight years we have been building roads to these two goals. Twenty-one nations of the world have entered into this type of relationship with the USSR. And this is the most significant factor in the maintenance of world peace today. Five years ago peace in Europe was a question. Today it is a fact. What has made the difference more than any one element has been the substitution of cooperation in developing the vast natural wealth of the USSR for the policy of isolating the USSR from the economic life of Europe.

You in America want peace. So do we. You want freedom of commercial intercourse on realistic bases. So do we. You want a modus vivendi in the Far East that will conduce to permanent peace and the stability and happiness of the Chinese people. So do we. We have so much in common that it would seem eminently desirable that our two countries work together to these ends. The French Government, in a similar situation, delegated M. de Monzie to make a study of the bases for possible negotiations before any official negotiations were entered into. If the President of the United States should delegate some man or group of men to make a like study, we would welcome it.

In the Driftway

WHEN the Drifter went to school, football was played by young men in blazers and shorts who kicked a theoretically round though imperfectly inflated ball from one to another along the ground, accompanied by a lot of shouting and a lot of fun. The game was played for the joy of it, and the few spectators who stood along the sidelines—in bustles or in standing collars which crossed over in front—did not matter very much. Winning, as ever in human history, was sweet, but even losing was a jolly good game. There were no hired coaches, there were no towering stadia, there were no Nijinski cheer leaders, there was no press box, there were no butter-and-egg men, overginned and over-raccoon coated, waving the flags of colleges they had never attended, there were no gate receipts, no scouts among the high schools, no odds upon the stock exchanges, no endowment funds embossed on pigskin, no electrically controlled score boards, no mass formation on the field, and no massed capital in the background.

It was an open game.

NOW the Drifter does not doubt that applying to football the soundly tested rules upon which the Steel Corporation was formed makes for bigger and better business. The railroads add to their passenger earnings, the manufacturers of bunting and rattan cannot but rejoice, the hot-dog industry is greatly stimulated, the curve of gasoline consumption rises sharply, innkeepers prepare to add their quota to investments in Florida real estate, and bootleggers make merry in Rolls Royces. Nor does the Drifter doubt that the Roman holiday gives pleasure to vastly more people than ever lined the playing fields of his youth. But of the game, and particularly the players of the game, he must confess to some perplexity. When Master George Owen of Harvard College says that all the fun has vanished, the Drifter feels a load upon his heart. While Master Harold Grange, late of the University of Illinois, with a half million in his pocket, remains somehow a lost and tragic figure. What can a young man do when he faces intrenched commercialism, the mob, and the newspapers who live by inflaming the mob? Where shall the joy of the game, aye, the very freedom of the soul itself, find surcease here? Down he must go, under the heels of the mob, under the muddy boots of the money changers, under the nameless obscenities of newspaper publicity. And down into the dust goes all that is clean and fine in sportsmanship. With the passage to official professionalism, the story becomes even sadder. Was Master Grange ever booed from the field while he played with his college mates? He was not. But in Boston and Pittsburgh, playing as a professional, he has been booed and jeered. Why? Because the trade goods he had to offer did not warrant the price paid, in the opinion of the consumer. As an incorporated business service furnishing raw material for moving-picture producers, cigarette manufacturers, garment makers, and radio distributors, at a scale of tariff almost fabulous; as the next friend of all the headline writers in the land, he must face the quite terrible responsibility of meeting the demands of the market.

* * * * *

FOR sport that is spontaneous and unfettered, the Drifter has only the most profound respect. For the massed phalanxes of big business he must, if he is to remain a citizen of the greatest republic ever heard of, maintain an attitude of respectful attention, if not of unqualified applause. But when the new wine of business enterprise is poured into the old bottles of sportsmanship the result, from the standpoint of one who knows his vintages, can only be disaster and the destruction of values.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since The Nation is our only source of news at our dog and goat ranch up country, we know nothing that The Nation doesn't know, and get all excited over the things, conditions, hopes, and fears that excite The Nation. So on a recent trip to the cities I looked into the picture-paper menace as described in The Nation's article The Picture Papers Win. And for once I was disappointed in The Nation. The writer of the article had pointed out the picture papers as something new, something departing from the ideals of journalism, something vaguely horrendous and threatening. They were offering huge sums of money for new circulation; they were cutting the heart out of the news of the day and substituting pictures, he cried.

But this picture-paper idea is all old stuff, as anyone but a provincial, spat-wearing New Yorker ought to know. The rest of the country has had it for twenty-five years to my own knowledge, and nothing very disastrous has resulted from it. I refer now to the country weeklies and the small-town dailies, which are made up largely of boiler-plate pictures of everything under the sun and which, periodically, to garner a few hundreds of circulation, offer prizes—premiums, as they are called. To give away $25,000 a day in a circulation gamble calls for no more insanity, sporting blood, or wealth in your town than the careless bestowal of a set of dishes by the circulation manager of the newspaper in a certain village that I could name.

Yes, the picture papers disappoint me. They are just about like the regular issue of our town's Bee and Visitor except that in New York the girls seem to wear their dresses a little shorter. Our little paper has all the puzzles, jokes, funny pictures; and the photographs of society people, murderers, and politicians—and not much of anything else.

The little paper I speak of has given away in varying quantities in the last few years, its circulation manager tells me, the following articles: dishes, jack-knives, berry spoons, pickle forks, lamps, clocks, books, kitchenware, fountain pens, horsewhips, Ford tires, gold-hilted toothpicks, hatchets, axes, bowie-knives, and vanity cases. And these gifts weren't striven for, as prizes, but given outright, given open-handedly, gladly.

May I mention, without offense, that The Nation lately seems to carry more illustrative matter than ever; to print more emphatic headlines on its front cover; to offer more tempting subscription bargains? Publishers will be publishers.

Speed-Murder

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of the causes of the French Revolution, one of the things which exasperated the Parisians to the point of frenzy, was the fact that "the fierce aristocrats" recklessly drove over "the people" in the streets of Paris with their carriages. Charles Dickens describes such an outrage in "A Tale of Two Cities," from which I quote, here, in an abbreviated form:

> With a wild rattle and clatter, and an inhuman abandonment of consideration not easy to be understood these days, the carriage dashed through the streets and swept round corners. At last, swooping at a street corner by a fountain, one of the wheels came to a sickening little jolt, and there was a loud cry from a number of voices and the horses reared and plunged.
> But for the latter inconvenience, the carriage probably would not have stopped; carriages were often known to drive on and leave their wounded behind.
> "What has gone wrong?" said Monsieur, calmly looking out.
> A tall man in a nightcap had caught up a bundle from among the feet of the horses, and laid it on the basement of the fountain, and was down in the mud and wet, howling over it, like a wild animal.
> "Pardon, Monsieur the Marquis!" said a ragged and submissive man, "it is a child."
> "Why does he make that abominable noise? Is it his child?"
> "Excuse me, Monsieur the Marquis—it is a pity—yes."
> "It is extraordinary to me," said Monsieur, "that you people cannot take care of yourselves and your children. One or the other of you is forever in the way."

Charles Dickens here appeals to our sympathy and indignation against the reckless killing of one child. In the City of New York, today, people are being killed by automobiles in exactly the same manner, with just such mad speed and reckless swooping round corners, at the rate of very nearly a thousand a year, including three hundred children, and some of our autoists, like Dickens's marquis, want to know why they don't get out of the way?

The Coal Strike from Inside

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am renewing my subscription to your paper, which I have subscribed for for these many years. I read it regularly and with the greatest respect for your editorial opinions. Sometimes I think you are not familiar with sufficient facts on which to base your opinions, the present anthracite situation being a fair sample of what I have in mind.

The consumers of anthracite coal demand certain sizes of coal known to the trade as "nut," "egg," "stove," etc. During the process of preparation of these sizes a large part of the coal is reduced to a fine condition known as "buckwheat" and "coal dust." This coal is the same chemically as the larger sizes, but the consumer refuses to buy it. Eventually these quantities of this fine coal accumulate and glut the storage capacity of the industry. There is a large money investment as well. As long as the industry keeps in motion the stock of fine coal accumulates until all storage capacity is full. A suspension of operations becomes desirable and even necessary.

The management of this industry consists of men like ourselves. They are placed by boards of directors, who in turn represent stockholders, who want dividends. If too much money is tied up in fine coal and additional storage capacity it is hard on dividends. Our business system requires dividends and, moreover, it now demands the elimination of waste as far as possible. This fine coal should not be wasted, but the consumer refuses to use it. The industry eventually comes to a place when a suspension is necessary. As long as the consumer can get the larger sizes of coal he will not use the fine coal.

Shall it be a shut-down, with the miners locked out, or a strike? A shut-down with a lockout would make the sale of the fine coal a difficult matter. A strike makes the sale easy and more profitable. Which would you or your readers prefer in the business you are engaged in? Your own business. Not the other fellow's.

The anthracite strike will be adjusted when the fine coal is disposed of. New York and New England are the large users of anthracite. It seems to be up to them.

"Provably," Not "Probably"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you please correct a misprinted word in the first paragraph of my letter in The Nation of December 9 concerning William Montgomery Brown? "Provably" should appear in the place of "probably." I would not ask for the correction of this word except for the fact that much of the force of my argument rests upon it. Today, as in the fourth century, the difference of a small letter of the alphabet may make a vast difference in the expression of human intention.

Lives of Great Men

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Observe and rejoice! At last even this Age of Big Business has found a practical use for the intelligentsia. It seems, according to a striking advertisement put out through the papers by a Florida real-estate company, that the appointment of Mr. Hamilton Holt to the presidency of Rollins College, Winter Park, is a cogent reason for immediately investing heavily in the Florida land said company has to sell, the presence of a noted man of brains being likely to boost values at once. It is an impressive thought!

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We should, in our own lives, grant
> And departing leave behind us
> Fortunes made in real estate . . . (by others).

"More Power to His Jaw"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For Colonel Mitchell let all good citizens wish more power to his jaw. He is doing excellent work in undermining discipline in the army and navy. As long as we must have these useless and pernicious institutions anything that weakens their morale should be welcomed. In that way their power to do harm will be lessened. Without desiring to accomplish such a result or dreaming of its possibility Colonel Mitchell is doing it just the same. May he never grow weary of well-doing.

It is not to be desired that Mitchell's agitation result in putting in control of the army and navy anyone more efficient than the present heads of these departments or the present Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy. Inefficiently conducted military institutions are less of a danger than efficiently conducted ones. Though the only good military force is a disbanded one, the next best is an inefficiently managed one with no respect for its superior officers. Between the present secretaries of the army and navy and Colonel Mitchell, that is the kind of army and navy we are on the way to getting. For once the right men are in the right places. May all be kept there until their places can be abolished.

Arkansawyers, Attention!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Several years ago an older brother introduced me to The Nation. My reading was always done in deep seclusion, and followed, invariably, by reverential prayer. I had as soon a prohibition officer had caught me red-handed with a jar of home brew as for a missionary Baptist to have found me reading The Nation. Later the Infernal Thing began to wring $5 from my pocket annually. And now I infer from an advertisement on the back of The Nation for September 30 that forty-four others in Arkansas have succumbed to the same malady.

I want to get in touch with the other victims. Either an infirmary should be endowed, with Dr. Mencken as its dean, or else the infidels should assemble under cover of night in some secluded mountain pass and organize a Nation Club for their own fiendish delight and for the dissemination of infidelity among the elect.

If you can aid me through the columns of your paper or by furnishing me with names and addresses, or both, I shall be very grateful to you.

Island House

By CHARLES NORMAN

The first to come when they had gone from there
Was one whom wind and tide had made afraid.
And there was an excitement in his hair
That made him wish the absent folk had stayed
When he came to the house and found it cold
And tenantless. He entered in as one
Bewitched; for while he wanted to be bold,
The rain poured down, and so he did not run.

And what it was he saw he never told;
But afterwards, some came and found him dead.
They saw chairs decked for guests that had been old
When most of them were children; and a bird
Screamed from a nest upon a dusty bed,
And made them seek each other when they heard.

First Glance

THE movement to revive Stephen Crane—if revival is the word for an author who has been dead only twenty-five years and whose best-known book has never suffered neglect—reaches its climax in the collected edition of his works which Wilson Follett is directing and which Mr. Knopf is publishing (12 volumes, to be sold in sets only at $90). The first volume of "The Work of Stephen Crane," containing "The Red Badge of Courage" and a very short story called "The Veteran," has at last been issued; and it is plain that physically the twelve volumes are to make a monument which no edition of an American author has matched for loveliness. The gray and black and gold of the covers and backs, the lavender of the end-papers and the title-pages, and the exceeding clearness of the text within will combine to produce a collectors' delight. I speak of collectors, for the price of the work, and indeed its very loveliness, may operate to confine its circulation among persons who will look at it rather than read it; and I hope that Mr. Knopf will be encouraged at some future date to issue a cheaper set for the mere reading public.

Joseph Hergesheimer introduces the present volume, according to a plan whereby the various titles of Crane are to be introduced by eminent authors in related fields of the imagination. The poems, for instance, will be issued with a commentary by Amy Lowell; and elsewhere there will be essays by Mr. Mencken, Mr. Anderson, and Miss Cather. Mr. Hergesheimer seems to have been a great deal more interested in setting all of his highly mannered adverbs between highly mannered commas than in saying all that could be said about "The Red Badge of Courage" (he nowhere mentions "The Veteran"). All that could be said about Crane's masterpiece would be, of course, a volume—providing some one existed who could say it. I admit that Crane is a most difficult author to write about critically, and I remember how in the introduction to Thomas Beer's biography of Crane two years ago Joseph Conrad said nothing in thirty-three pages. The precise excellence of "The Red Badge of Courage," however, deserves analysis. It has never got it, and Mr. Hergesheimer does not give it—though he pays tribute in passing to the humor, the sense of proportion, the singleness of purpose, the skill in reproducing speech, and in general the poetry of this amazing book in which a young writer so suddenly and so brilliantly displayed in their purest forms the powers which were to distinguish all of his output.

The analysis I speak of would begin, I suspect, with a more particular analysis of the one passion which Crane from his first story to his last was concerned with dissecting. Mr. Beer and others have pointed out that this was fear; and obviously "The Red Badge of Courage" is among other things a study of fear. Just how fear, which may be a destructive emotion, may also be the inspiration of fruitful art—as it frequently is—calls for an explanation. The perfect critic of "The Red Badge of Courage," though he may fail to give a final answer to this psychological question, will at any rate describe the minuter stages by which in Crane's case panic became poetry. And he will find valuable material for a foot-note in "The Veteran," which tells in seven pages how old Fleming, who ran from his first battle, did not run away from a burning barn. Then there is the language of Crane. But that, too, must be left to the perfect critic.

Why Curb the Courts?

Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court. By Charles Warren. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

THOSE who are persuaded that it is an excellent thing in government to have what Professor Burgess calls "an aristocracy of the robe" will welcome Mr. Warren's reasons why we should not tamper with the existing power of the Supreme Court over legislation. Mr. Warren may hurt them a little by occasional concessions that from time to time the Supreme Court has done things which it ought not to have done, but the hurt will be solaced by the thought that it is better to suffer from a few judicial blunders than to be exposed to the hypothetical horrors which an unrestrained legislature might inflict upon helpless constituents. We might descend to the sad state of the poor Britishers if we allowed Congress to repass laws which the Supreme Court declares unconstitutional. We might even have a minimum-wage law for women in the District of Columbia. We might lose our constitutional right to a speedy and public trial and be subjected to a slow private one. We might be permitted to manufacture intoxicating liquors. We might suffer an abridgment of freedom of speech or of the press. From such horrors we are saved because we have a court to save us. Now and then this saving grace is extended by only five of the nine judges. We should be content with this and not ask for six or seven. It would be absurd if a minority of the judges could sanction legislative monstrosities. Senator Borah and the late Senator La Follette are full of unwisdom for suggesting the contrary.

Such is my warped version of Mr. Warren's theme. His book is better than this version would make it appear, but he makes me peevish by his surface and sub-surface sneering at "politicians, labor leaders, or social reformers, of whatever degree of eminence," and by his profession that he is so full of fact and they so full of folly. So my peevishness makes me emulate his own bad intellectual manners. By way of atonement I advise all interested in the subject to read the book. It is the best book I know on this side of the case. It shows that the Supreme Court has been wise more often than it has been foolish. It shows that Congress may be foolish as well as wise. It shows that judicial follies are now and then undone by judicial recantation or by constitutional amendment. It shows that Labor with a capital L can gain as well as lose by court decree. It gives a lot of useful and interesting information. It has a fine format. It is a high-grade propaganda tract.

The major weakness in the performance is its failure to portray in any detail the actual enterprise of the Supreme Court in passing upon legislation. Lawyers will know what Mr. Warren means when he says that "the court does not veto' or 'annul' an act of Congress," but working women who lose the benefit of a minimum-wage law will wonder. Even lawyers might wish for more analysis of the complaint that judges in passing upon police-power legislation "invoke their own social and economic views as against the social and economic views of the majority of Congress." Mr. Warren contents himself with the observation that "incidentally it may be stated that it is not a fact that the justices do, consciously, act in this manner." The only support for this is a declaration by Mr. Justice Brandeis that it is a firmly established principle that the court may not inquire into the motives of Congress or into the wisdom of legislation. This is an oft-repeated judicial declaration, but no candid person can say that the court lives up to it or could live up to it and still apply to legislation the canon that it lacks due process if it is not reasonable but arbitrary. When the declaration appears so frequently in dissenting opinions as a criticism of the action of the majority, it is clear enough that the dissenters are conscious that their colleagues act on the basis of personal views of social and economic policy. If the others are really unconscious of what they are doing, they are greater simpletons than is suspected even by the most eminent of Mr. Warren's politicians, labor leaders, and social reformers. Mr. Warren's own careful introduction of the qualifying word "consciously" suggests a desire to dodge the troublesome charge as he hurries on to cite something in the New Republic in support of his indictment that "here again, however, people are misled by half-truths, suppressions of fact, and misstatements."

Similar failings on Mr. Warren's part are doubtless due somewhat to the fact that some of his chapters are the fruit of addresses made during the campaign of 1924. Perhaps if he were more dominantly the scholar in the library and the thinker on the throne of thought he might have gone beyond his mathematics and his mechanics and have undertaken a qualitative appraisal, might have considered whether the conceded judicial blunders do not raise the question whether we should not apply some other remedies even if we reject the proposals he condemns. The veto or annulment (if I may say so) of a minimum-wage law is not compensated for by judicial approval of a dozen other laws. Mr. Warren deals with laws annulled and laws sustained as a book-keeper deals with dollars paid and dollars received. While he here uses to advantage the same burrowing powers which made his "Supreme Court in United States History" such a welcome contribution, his failure to look at the whole of his problem, his shortcomings in analysis, and his weakness in evaluation must detract from the scholarly reputation which his earlier work had won for him.

THOMAS REED POWELL

England and Our Civil War

Great Britain and the American Civil War. By Ephraim Douglass Adams. Longmans, Green and Company. Two volumes. $10.

PROFESSOR ADAMS'S two volumes are avowedly based upon the material gathered from English sources by the late Charles Francis Adams for a life of his father, the United States Minister at the Court of St. James's during the War of Secession. This material, of the highest value historically, Mr. Adams obtained by special favor of the English authorities and possessors, who recognized his peculiar claims. Public and private collections were opened to him at his request and rich returns obtained at no small cost. Professor Adams does not state in his preface how he secured a right to use this material for his own purpose, a purpose in no way connected with the life of Charles Francis Adams, and it is known that he did not first ask and obtain permission of the owners of this material—the Adams family. Under the circumstances some explanation on his part is needed in order to establish his position.

Without that material these volumes could never have been written. The private letters of Palmerston, Russell, Lyons, Gladstone, and Cowley form a body of testimony the meaning of which could not have been conjectured from the public acts and utterances of the writers, for they are instinct with a frankness that often amounts to indiscretion. They alter the usually accepted account of the diplomacy of the war period and undoubtedly change the general conception of British policy in that day. Professor Adams has on the whole framed a vindication of the policy of the Palmerston ministry toward the States—Northern and Southern. In fact, he carries it too far, and in seeking to assert the intention of being neutral he passes over or explains away acts plainly unneutral and almost hostile. The exchange of comment among the ministers makes strange reading, smart as it often is; for it develops the personal limitations and the real wishes of the writers, wishes that only the strong influence of Palmerston or the pressure of events made harmless. If the forms of neutrality were observed there existed an opposition to the policy of the North in its contest with secession that only required a series of Southern victories to make it potent. Never before have the dangers threatening the North from foreign interference been so clearly developed as in this new material. Opportunism continually menaced neutrality.

Collaborating as he did for a time with Mr. Adams in the "Life" of Charles F. Adams, Professor Adams had the advantage of knowing his point of view and of becoming acquainted with his form of statement. Mr. Adams had fully treated the proclamation of neutrality, the negotiations on the Declaration of Paris on privateering, the approach by the British Cabinet to intervention or recognition, and the seizure of the rams. In each case an earlier opinion was modified, even reversed, by a study of the new material, for Mr. Adams was intellectually one of the most honest of men.

When Professor Adams goes outside of those subjects and of the Adams material and rests upon his own resources the relation suffers. Not only has this resulted in a badly proportioned story—three-fourths of the space bring it to the end of 1863—but it has given rise to interpretations not warranted by the texts. The author, unaware that the diplomatic papers of the Confederacy have been printed by the Navy Department, rests on Richardson; he does not know of West's study of French opinion during the war; and he has not correctly estimated the effect on European politics of Napoleon's Mexican adventure. His explanation of the long-delayed seizure of the Laird rams as due to a threat of privateering on the part of the North is not acceptable even as an excuse—not a cause—for the seizure itself; the political change that came over England during the decade was influenced by the War of Secession and the success of the North, but hardly so greatly as Professor Adams would have us believe.

Yet the story told in these volumes could not fail to be interesting because of the richness of the material the writer has appropriated for it, and it is only to be regretted that Professor Adams did not await the publication of the life of the great minister who represented the United States in London during the war. Then he could have used the documents without question of right and with a broader knowledge of what the interests of the North required from Europe. He would also have had at hand a standard for the descriptions of character in which his volumes are quite lacking—and all the leading actors had picturesque qualities. The index is eccentric in form and does not even give the full names of such prominent men as Benjamin, Bunch, Bruce, Blair, Belligny, or Booth—to take a single letter of the alphabet; nor can these be learned from the text or notes. The history of English opinion on the American war is still to be written; Professor Adams has made a contribution by serving up records which hitherto were unattainable.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

Villain Gold

Sudden Wealth. By Henry James Forman. Boni and Liveright. $2.

SOMEWHERE in the later writings of John Thane the sufficiently curious reader will find this passage: "The love of money needs a Freud to analyze it. If the prime impulses of mankind can be reduced to the two hungers for eating and for begetting, and if the enormous elaborations of love can be traced to a simple hunger, then possibly the enormous elaborations of the will to get and save and spend can be traced to a simple hunger, working regularly in a few discernible ways. Surely sophisticated luxury is no more remote from the impulse to eat than is sophisticated love from the impulse to beget. Yet greed and luxury have had no adequate scientists to explain their behavior. They have been left, instead, in the partisan hands of the moralists."

In the light of this passage Henry James Forman's "Sudden Wealth" takes on a color which few of the admirers of the book have thrown upon it. George and Laura Pollock are violently overwhelmed by a rush of unearned money. George loses his radicalism and Laura her figure. They upholster their own lives with superfluities and meddle in the lives of others, obedient to that instinct to exercise power which the possession of wealth makes almost irresistible. Numerous complications follow. Not only do the Pollocks pay with satiety and stupidity but their beneficiaries, Stephen Shore and Flavia Parsons, are first flung into comfort and then jerked back out of it, with results which run through the whole story and in time dim the careers of the benefactors. The plot mounts in confusion, tangles everybody in the toils of money, and ends ironically when Stephen Shore, no less suddenly than George Pollock, inherits the gold which has been the villain of the plot.

This ironical conclusion lifts the story from the moralistic plane on which it occasionally moves. Pure moralism would have made Stephen refuse to burn his fingers as he has seen his uncle's burned. Mr. Forman, however, allows the second victim to be engulfed again—"another episode in the vast and stormy tragi-comedy of destiny." "Sudden Wealth" thus becomes less an argument and more a document. It might, indeed, have been more a document still if the author had trimmed it to sparer dimensions and had conducted his narrative along a single line of development from one inheritance to the other. Had he done so, his irony might have rung like steel. As it is, the tone of the book is considerably muted by subordinate details. But the document now presented is voluminous if not explicit, and it is full of admirable strokes of nature.

What Mr. Forman avoids best is the merely romantic conception of wealth. His characters, with their pockets unexpectedly filled, do not all at once become gifted with the delicate arts of emptying pockets without also emptying themselves. He has studied each one of them with a close imaginative attention to what that one would be likely to do in such a gust of fortune. Consequently he has brought together a body of valuable cases for the use of any behaviorist who wishes to be the Freud of greed and luxury. Moreover, though Mr. Forman writes without remarkable passion or flexibility, he has written an intelligent, convincing novel.

CARL VAN DOREN

Suspense. By Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

Had Conrad lived to finish his last tale he would not have made it one of his major novels. The uncompleted "Suspense" has kinship with stories like "The Rover" wherein the idea of Napoleon rather than Napoleon dominates the scene. It has all the familiar Conrad technique to which by this time the public has grown fashionably accustomed. It has the heroine mysterious and enchanted like a dream and the young man caught into the skein unwound by fate and nature and the sea and the conspirators darkly represented. It has elaboration and an extraordinary vividness of natural setting and an equally extraordinary dulness of development. As in the other Conrad novels, the mighty initial groundswell does not carry one to the revelation of divine godhead. The preparations are always impressive and fateful; but somehow the final lightning flash does not tear the clouds from the face of the eternal.

The Annam Jewel. By Patricia Wentworth. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

The Thousand and Second Night. By Frank Heller. T. Y. Crowell and Company. $2.

The Death of a Millionaire. By G. D. H. and Margaret Cole. The Macmillan Company. $2.

More and more writers are trying to make the detective story into a tedious combination of character study and love interest. One turns with relief from such a story as "The Annam Jewel" to the Fantomas series where the heroine has as much certainty of being bumped off as the millionaire. Miss Wentworth has written two good detective stories, but apparently someone has delighted in her love interest, and so in "The Annam Jewel" she has decided to be sentimental. In "The Thousand and Second Night" you meet again the irresistible Mr. Collin, who is a much more fascinating rogue than Raffles or Lupin and who has a fund of ironic wit on things in general. This time he has gone to Africa and got into a series of Arab escapades. In "The Death of a Millionaire" Mr. and Mrs. Cole stir you up about a murdered millionaire and a nice young heir and the pertinacity of Scotland Yard men.

Doodab. By Harold Loeb. Boni and Liveright. $2.

"Doodab" is a perplexing exploitation of methods which Mr. Loeb has not succeeded in focusing into a vision of his own. Except for a few tricks, such as impressionistic psychology that fails of being "interior monologue" because it is not interior to the characters but trumped up by the author, and a reach for transferred epithet drawing so indiscriminately upon its use by Joyce or Waldo Frank or Cummings that it never stands for the thing seen and thus becomes a heavily tortuous vulgarity—except for these, "Doodab" is the ordinary novel of trade. Misunderstood hero on the wheel of American business like another Ixion; his beautiful daughter loved by his 100 per cent American employer who discharges him and precipitates the tragedy; background of flappers repudiating Queen Victoria.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Music

New and Old

TIME reveals many wonders, but none more astonishing than its continuous redefinition of the old and the new. Two seasons ago, for instance, one went to a concert of modern music much as if one were going to modern Russia—the truth was to be learned and proclaimed at all costs. If one were sympathetically inclined, all that was worthless and unpleasant was to be silently endured for the sake of the cause. If one were not, then the cause was to be judged by whatever was worthless and unpleasant. The spirit of the conscious crusader was rampant on both sides, and between the two the orchestral conductor trod warily, with one eye on the "novelty" he was bound to present and with the other on the old ladies and gentlemen—time-honored subscribers—who were equally bound to walk out in the midst of a performance and write indignant letters afterward to the management and the press.

Today, however, a first concert by the League of Composers brings out a large quota of the one-time opposition, and an early concert by the Philharmonic is devoted largely to the works of a modern Italian composer, Alfredo Casella, played before a huge and hugely interested audience. The irreconcilables are no longer irreconcilable! And the only conclusion one can draw is that modern music is no longer new. If one needed further proof, there is the fact that the Metropolitan Opera Company has taken Debussy, Ravel, and even Stravinsky into its repertory.

The League presented on its first program Marion Bauer's second sonata for violin and piano; two Hungarian and two Czech folk-songs, set respectively by Bela Bartok and Vaclav Stepan; a quartet for strings by Mario Labroco; a new piano sonata by Stravinsky; and Louis Grünberg's "Jazzberries"—a great improvement over the programs of former years, when works were given indiscriminately because they were "modern." All of the composers just cited, however, had won distinction by their work, though not all of the works mentioned would have won distinction for their composers. The "Jazzberries," for instance, with its fox trot, blues, waltz, and syncopep, showed neither the good, red flesh of jazz nor yet the rich, vitalizing juice of the berry, but a watery, Continental concoction of the sort that not infrequently, today, takes the name of jazz in vain. The settings of the folk-songs followed the method now fashionable of disguising a simple and naive subject with a sophisticated treatment. The sonata by Marion Bauer, on the other hand, showed sincerity and development in this composer, and the quartet by Labroco was direct and not without poetic charm, though at times, particularly in the first movement, it was frankly music of the conventional Italian opera. The piano sonata by Stravinsky proved the greatest disappointment. With the Labroco quartet it had been given at the international festival in Venice in September—an honor quite out of proportion to its merits; for in itself it was a spurious imitation of Bach and Beethoven rather than of Stravinsky himself. And with this abject return by the composer of the "Sacre" to the safe folds of the past one might well believe that many of the trails being blazed at this moment are but blind ones, cerebrally hewed, which must eventually lead back, not necessarily to the well-worn paths of the classics but to the broad, open roads of emotional experience. Mr. Casella's contributions to the Philharmonic program only served to strengthen this conviction. For here the cerebral refinements of his "Partita" are thrown into pallid relief by the hot, primitive little folk-tunes incorporated in his suite from "La Giara" and in his orchestral rhapsody "Italia"; as a result this very conscious if skilful effort to return to the "purer classic form" resolves into mere historical reiterations.

That the freshness of a composition is not determined by its date in history was, indeed, demonstrated beyond question by the English Singers at their recent recital of old madrigals and motets. Here was music older than Shakespeare, done much as it was done in his day by a group of six singers seated informally around a table with their part books in their hands; and yet an audience inured to the subtilizings of Schönberg sat and marveled at its intricacies and newness. Tudor England was there in all its lyric and dramatic accents; but because these accents were informed by emotions eternally recurrent they also pointed the life of today, and in doing this they pointed the gaps left by our musical experimentalists. The English Singers reached a high peak of beauty, both in the material they presented and in the manner of its presentation. But the greatest service they rendered, perhaps, was to remind us that the novelty of its delight is already four hundred years old.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

Mr. Coward Again

THOUGH "Easy Virtue" (Empire Theater) is more hackneyed in theme than "The Vortex" it is, on the whole, the best of the three plays by Noel Coward recently produced here, and it illustrates admirably that vivacity of mind which is the chief cause of his success. For it has taken the old, old story of the demi-mondaine who fails in a perfectly sincere effort to adapt herself to the ways of the conventional family into which she has married, and though he has neither given this story any new twist nor attempted to make any new comment upon the two traditions of life involved the mere liveliness of his mind has sufficed to sustain an interest straight through to the foregone conclusion.

It would not, to be sure, be difficult to point out the various negative defects of the play. The characterization is extremely superficial, and the detachment with which the situations are regarded is rather the detachment of a facile indifference than that of an artistic skepticism. But over all of these defects Mr. Coward triumphs, at least to the extent of never failing to be momentarily entertaining, and the secret of his success is, first of all, the secret of bustle and movement. In this as in his other plays he has provided himself with an abundance of supernumerary characters and he keeps them all on the go. Someone is always coming in or going out; the ball of conversation is kept continually rolling; and at every moment there is some little conflict, relevant or irrelevant, between some of the personages involved. Nothing, moreover, ever lasts very long. No two characters are together for more than a few minutes at a time and they never make speeches. En route from one door to another—they are always going somewhere—they meet for an instant to exchange brief snippets of conversation and then depart to make way for someone else. If a dead moment seems to impend a temporary diversion is created to fill it up, and thus the interest is perpetually titillated if it is never very profoundly engaged. And of course there is always an appropriate "curtain." At the end of the second act the heroine smashes a statue as so many other heroines have done, and at the end of the third act she stands desolate as so many heroines have stood while the sounds of revelry come in through a half-open door. But neither of these conventional stage pictures is quite so revealing of the author's method as is the first curtain of all. The climax of the act has already passed and there is nothing to provide any sort of situation, but the author suddenly sends the whole company sweeping across the stage to the dining-room and thus provides the temporary and sometimes meaningless bustle which he always keeps up.

Though Mr. Coward certainly has a gift for the depiction of manners he has, I suspect, no artistic conscience at all. In its place, however, is an accurate sense of what tricks of the stage are definitely outmoded and what will still work upon even a fairly sophisticated audience. He is thus the legitimate descendant of those makers of well-made plays who were so much admired in the nineteenth century, for though they would shudder at the looseness and the casualness of his structure his purpose is essentially the same—to provide amusement for those somewhat above the reach of the more obvious and less adroit varieties of hokum. He knows, for example, that a contemporary audience is as bored by the laborious neatness of "Camille" as it is unresponsive to its solemn sentimentality, and he knows equally well that it has passed beyond the stage where the "problem" of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" seems profound. But the type situation represented by these plays still has its theatrical value. Give it a contemporary setting, invest it with the casualness of manners and morals appropriate to the times, and you have an undoubted success even if you call it by a title as little indicative of the real spirit of the piece as "Easy Virtue." An excellent company in which Jane Cowl, Marda Vanne, and Joan Clement Scott particularly distinguish themselves will contribute much to the popularity to which the play is undoubtedly destined.

"The Devil to Pay," a genre comedy by the Dutch dramatist Herman Heijermans now being presented by the Stagers at their Fifty-second Street Theater, is one of those transition plays which seem so new-fashioned when they are written and so old-fashioned a very short time afterward. Its method and atmosphere are strangely Victorian until, just before the end, events take a new turn and the heroine, with an elaborate to-do and a full consciousness of acting madly up to the concepts of a new morality, refuses to marry the villain who has seduced her but is now willing to "do the right thing." Evidently Heijermans first introduced into Holland the idea that it is, in Shaw's words, poor policy to "marry Violet to a scoundrel by way of reforming her character"; and the fact explains the fame of the play in the author's native land. It does not, however, explain why the Stagers should choose it for production here, even though it does give Margaret Wycherly the opportunity to do an excellent piece of acting in a rather outmoded character part.

Owen Davis's not particularly robust farce "Beware of Widows" (Maxine Elliott) is kept alive by the skill of Madge Kennedy. "Oh, Oh, Nurse" (Cosmopolitan Theater) is a musical comedy so near the average of its class as to defy any attempt at commentary.

A Zionist View of Palestine

By LEONARD STEIN

SIR HERBERT SAMUEL'S five years' pro-consulate in Jerusalem has come to an end, and with it a well-marked stage in the post-war history of Palestine. Sir Herbert's appointment in July, 1920, was given a special significance by the events which led up to it. When the war came to an end the Allies, headed by Great Britain, were on record in favor of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jews. It had also been agreed in principle that Palestine should be administered, though not annexed, by Great Britain. Translated into post-war terms this meant that it was to be placed under a British mandate. In Paris, however, the Allies, occupied with problems nearer home, had little time to spare for Palestine, which was left to drift aimlessly on as Turkish territory under British occupation. It was not until the San Remo Conference of April, 1920, that the situation began to be regularized. At San Remo the mandate for Palestine was formally assigned to Great Britain, who undertook to carry the Balfour Declaration into effect. Three years of wearisome negotiation were still to elapse before the mandate became technically operative. But the interregnum was for practical purposes at an end. Both Great Britain and Palestine now knew precisely where they stood. It was, therefore, at this stage that Mr. Lloyd George's Governme it decided to mark the opening of a new era by bringing the military regime to a close and substituting a permanent administration under a civilian high commissioner. What was more, the Government boldly selected as the first high commissioner for Palestine a distinguished Jew, a Jew whose political preoccupations—he had held some of the highest offices in the state—had not prevented him from actively identifying himself with the Zionist cause.

The appointment was acclaimed throughout the Jewish world as an earnest of British good-will. Such indeed it was. But those who knew Sir Herbert Samuel best were well aware that whatever else he might do he would certainly not weigh the scales in favor of his coreligionists. On this point the very fact that he was a Jew made him almost hypersensitive; indeed, it was not long before the Jews, or some of them, were heard to complain that he was leaning backwards. Be that as it may, he made it from first to last a point of honor to show a scrupulous regard not only for Arab rights but for Arab susceptibilities. Little by little the Arabs realized that he meant to be their friend.

The best measure of his success is the contrast between the Palestine of 1920 and the Palestine of 1925. When he took office in July, 1920, Palestine was suffering not only from economic depression but from serious political unrest. Ever since the armistice its fate had been in suspense, and propagandists of every description had been diligently fishing in troubled waters. A menacing anti-Zionist agitation had been worked up, and at Easter, 1920, immediately before the San Remo Conference, there had been rioting in the streets of Jerusalem. The situation was not improved by the course of events in other parts of the East. The emergence of an Arab kingdom in Iraq, the growing pressure of the nationalist agitation in Egypt, the successful defiance of Europe by Mustapha Kemal, the closing of the ranks throughout the Moslem world—all this was not without disturbing reactions in Palestine. Faced with an organized campaign against the mandate and its implications, the High Commissioner showed a patient forbearance which was at first ill-rewarded. In May, 1921, the Arabs of the Jaffa district rose almost en masse against their Jewish neighbors. It was six days before the rioting was suppressed with a loss of ninety-five Jewish and Arab lives. From this point the situation so far improved that there has since been no serious disturbance of the peace. The Arab leaders, however, rejected every attempt to conciliate them. They were offered a constitution giving Palestine a generous instalment of representative institutions. Having wrecked the elections by means of an organized boycott they were invited to take their seats on a nominated advisory council. Having declined to serve they were informed that if a representative Arab body were constituted the Government would welcome its advice and cooperation in matters affecting Arab interests. This third proposal was contemptuously rejected by the Arab extremists, who clung to their policy of non-cooperation. But at this point the cup was full. The Government now left the irreconcilables to their own devices, and since the end of 1923 it has made no further experiments in constitutional reform. Curiously enough, this change of policy had a healthy effect. The Government had made no attempt to use the strong hand. It had gone to the limit of conciliation, but it had shown that its patience was not inexhaustible. The prestige of the non-cooperators was severely shaken.

But if the tension has sensibly relaxed, it is not merely because the extremists have suffered a tactical defeat. What has completed their discomfiture is the fact that all their predictions have been signally falsified. After five years of the new regime, the Arab rank-and-file are in a position to judge for themselves whether or not they are being victimized. They know, on the evidence of their own eyes, that the British mandate and the flow of Jewish immigrants have had none of the sinister consequences they have been invited to expect.

Only those who knew Palestine in the days of the Turks can appreciate all that it owes to the new regime. The law courts have been purged of the corruption which made Ottoman justice a by-word. The Turks did little or nothing for education. The Government now supports over three hundred schools, with nearly 20,000 pupils. All these schools are for the benefit of the Arabs, the Jews being left to provide Hebrew schools at their own expense, with the assistance of a trifling grant-in-aid. The public-health authorities have successfully waged war on the twin scourges of Palestine—malaria and trachoma. Fifty thousand children are now under medical observation for eye disease, while the mosquito anopheles has already been driven out of nearly all the towns as well as a large number of villages. The country has been opened up by the improvement of communication. The Government has spent not far short of $10,000,000 on the Palestine railways. At the same time, it has nearly doubled the mileage of the first-class roads, and has also built 375 miles of secondary roads, serving 177 villages. Above all, it has preserved order and has given Palestine an unaccustomed sense of security. Brigandage has been suppressed, and an end has been put to Bedouin raids across the Jordan. For four years there has been no serious disturbance of the public peace.

From all this the Arabs have benefited at least as much as the Jews. In some respects, notably in the case of public education, they have benefited more. In no respect can it be truthfully said that the Jews have been singled out for favors at their expense. This does not mean that no advance has been made toward the establishment of the Jewish national home. On the contrary, its foundations have been solidly laid. Some 50,000 Jews have settled in Palestine since 1920 and have been successfully absorbed. The volume of immigration is steadily growing and is now at the rate of well over 2,000 a month. Agriculture, industry, and trade are visibly reacting to the stimulus of Jewish energy and enterprise, supported by something like $35,000,000 of Jewish capital. There is a network of Hebrew schools, and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, though not yet complete, has already been enabled to open its doors. In a word, the Jews are steadily building up a vigorous and many-sided society, with a tone and color of its own. To all this the indispensable background is the British mandate, with its guaranties of peace, order, and good government. But in a more positive sense the establishment of the Jewish national home owes little or nothing to external support. The actual work of reconstruction has been left to the almost unaided efforts of the Jews themselves. The acquisition of land is a case in point. It was at one time assumed that the Government would be able to place considerable areas of state or waste land at the disposal of the Zionist organization. Up to the present, at all events, these expectations have not been realized. With a few small exceptions, whatever land has been required for Jewish colonization has had to be bought, often at inflated prices, in the open market. In this, as in other respects, the Jews have had to rely in the main upon their own resources. What they do owe to the British mandate—and the debt is substantial—is the gradual creation of a favorable atmosphere.

Finnish Politics

VAINO TANNER, chairman and parliamentary leader of the Social Democratic Party of Finland, recently made a speech on Finnish politics in the home of the Finnish Workers' Educational Association, 2056 Fifth Avenue.

For Finland, as a whole, and for the labor movement especially, the new era began in 1918, when Finland received her independence. Previously all effective reforms passed by the Finnish Diet were rejected by the Czar. In the election of 1916 the Social Democrats received a majority of three seats in the Diet. A fusion administration was formed by the Social Democrats and Liberal parties, Socialists holding half of the most important administrative posts. Oskar Tokoi, a Social Democrat, was Premier. The future seemed bright, but then we made a grave mistake. The masses did not understand the country's precarious position and were rejoicing over their newly acquired power.

The peaceful tactics of the Social Democrats didn't satisfy the forces of Labor, which want quicker results through revolutionary action. Now we almost unanimously admit that starting the civil war was a mistake, but it is plain that it was unavoidable. Unemployment was great. Food was scarce and starvation was at the door of every worker in the country. The dissolution of Parliament and the holding of an election under abnormal conditions whereby the bourgeois parties secured a working majority fanned the revolutionary agitation. The Bolsheviki had come into power in Russia by armed force and revolutionary agitation had unceasingly been carried on among the neighboring Finns. Arms and the help of the Russian Red navy were promised, inspiring the forces of unemployed workers to action. The Social Democratic Party resisted, but the pressure upon it was too heavy, and it had to give way, even though its leaders protested.

Civil wars are always bloody. Ours was the bloodiest. Twenty thousand workingmen fell fighting, 10,000 were executed by military courts, 13,000 died in penitentiaries where they were herded like cattle, there being at one time 90,000 incarcerated workingmen and women. Sixty thousand were disfranchised and the bourgeois parties reveled in their revenge. In the absence of Social Democratic representation—all the party parliamentary members were jailed or exiled, save one—the bourgeois parties convened Parliament, repealed most of the labor and progressive laws, and declared Finland a monarchy, electing a German prince for king.

But then something happened they hadn't counted on. Revolution in Germany brought down the military machine relied upon by the Finnish bourgeoisie. For diplomatic reasons the king never reached Finland. A new election was held and the Social Democrats again received 80 seats, making the republican form of government safe. A liberal President was elected and civil liberties returned. The confiscated properties were returned to the Labor organizations and Socialist papers began to appear as normally. It was then that hope again dawned for a reconstructive era for Finnish labor.

Then Communist agitation started the break in the ranks of labor. It was first felt in 1919. At first the Communists tried underground methods. They remained in the labor organizations, but stirred up the uninformed elements and created distrust of the leaders. When the Social Democratic Party was strong enough to eject the Communists from its ranks, they formed a new party and began an attack from the outside which was not effective, although the Communists used all known methods. None need wonder that the Communists at first succeeded in securing a certain following of the unexperienced, but after their start their power steadily declined. In the first election for the Diet the Communists received only 27 seats, while the Social Democrats got 53. In the election of 1924 the Communist representation fell to 18 and the Social Democratic bloc was raised to 60 members. The Communists had some success in the ranks of the trade-union movement, but their destructive tactics had an evil effect there, too. The union membership has steadily declined and the organizations have become dormant, powerless bodies. The cooperative movement alone has remained untouched and has grown fast. It comprises Communists, Socialists, and bourgeois, but the leading positions are held by Social Democrats. The Communist movement would have died a natural death if the bourgeois administration had not arrested leading Communists and made martyrs of them, thus helping the Communist agitation, just as the Communist propaganda has aided the Fascist reaction.

Economically, Finland has weathered the crisis fairly well. Financial [illegible] and stability has been established. It is true that the standard of living of the workers is yet far beneath that in America, but an active labor movement and the rapid development of our industries are promising factors. Reviewing the last 25 years of the Finnish labor movement, we can proudly point to the reforms we have secured. Still we have to admit that many of our achievements are the results of changes that occurred outside of Finland. We have benefited by revolutions, none of our own. Our revolution, the civil war, was a failure. First we received the franchise and Parliament as the result of the Russian revolution of 1905. The independence of Finland came from the Russian revolution of 1917, and the German revolution restored civil liberties to us.

THE MOB AND THE SNOB

"To the man in the street, Mob and Snob are two distinctly opposite entities, one confined to strikers breaking windows, with whom our red blooded vigilantes know how to deal, and the other a purely exotic culture of nobility worship, from which we of the U. S. are (somehow) protected by tariff."

"But Lothrop Stoddard's 'Revolt Against Civilization' appals us with a spectral Mob (man in the street incog?), no mere sporadic nuisance, but a threat of general destruction, unless we find means to circumvent it by Nordic protectorate (snob?) and birth repression applied particularly against non-Nordic tribes (mob?), whose consent is taken for granted."

Starting from this THE DECIMALIST makes out its case against the whole Mob-Snob (inferiority-superiority) complex, always epidemic, and proposes a definite cure to which both Radicals and Conservatives can with equal consistency subscribe. It will also test any reader's Liberalism though not his liberality, for the current number is free without obligation. Address:

THAT COLONEL MITCHELL would be found guilty was predictable when his court martial assembled. If there had been any doubt, some of the utterances of members of the court would have made their prejudice plain. But prejudiced or not, they could find no other verdict. Colonel Mitchell was technically guilty, and the court had, moreover, to stand by the service and the War Department. To render any other verdict would call for a bench of moral heroes such as cannot be found in any army. The system simply had to be sustained. As for the sentence, it is obviously inadequate. Colonel Mitchell should have been dismissed if guilty of untruthfulness in accusing the War and Navy departments of treasonable negligence and of needlessly sacrificing human lives. But that would have made him a martyr, which the War Department did not want. Moreover, if Colonel Mitchell were dismissed he could tour the country denouncing both the departments. Now, if he accepts the sentence, he will still be under military control and subject to another court martial if he speaks again. Under the circumstances it would not be surprising if he should resign. We hope he will and keep the fires of criticism alight. The final blow to Colonel Mitchell's case was the publication of two official statements—first, the report of the Morrow board whitewashing the Air Service, then the letter from former Secretary Weeks to President Coolidge attacking Mitchell's record. The inadequacy of the Morrow report is described in an article by Mr. Scaife on another page of this issue. The irony of Secretary Weeks's criticism is also revealed in that article through a fragment of correspondence which shows the Secretary of War intervening with the Department of Justice in behalf of an aircraft company accused of defrauding the government.

SECRETARY KELLOGG'S DEFENSE of his course in the Saklatvala and Karolyi cases before the Council of Foreign Relations in New York City was marked by much passion and self-righteousness. He insisted that the law was right, that he believed in it, and that to protect America from people whose opinions were not liked was a sacred duty in order to protect free speech and the other liberties which he reminded us took hundreds of years to win. He and his critics have precisely the same end; they differ only as to methods! Nothing could, in our judgment, display more clearly the mental confusion of our Secretary of State. Of course, in the case of the Karolyis they are not communists, nor anarchists, nor even socialists, and Mr. Kellogg is careful not to quote any of their alleged views. He takes refuge behind that clause of the law which makes it unnecessary for the Secretary to state why anybody is excluded. So the American public is left in the dark as to what terrible things about the Karolyis our consular and diplomatic agents abroad have confided to the State Department. The best comment on this passionate outburst of Mr. Kellogg we take from the New York World:

> "Ma," it pipes.
> "Yes, dear," says Mother Kellogg.
> "Ma, why can't the Countess Karolyi come into this free country?"
> "Because," answers Mother Kellogg.
> "But, Ma, what law is there that keeps her out?"
> "It may be this law; it may be that law. Children shouldn't ask questions."
> "But, Ma, don't you have to prove something to me?"
> "No, dear, I don't. That is quite enough for you to know."
> "But, Ma, isn't it any of my business? And if it isn't what is?"
> "Never mind. Now toddle off to bed. And don't ask questions. Mother knows best."

HOW MUCH LONGER is the idea going to prevail that the President is a leader? The receipt of the invitation to join the preparatory disarmament conference at Geneva threw him into a flutter. He had announced in speech after speech that he would join any such conference and welcome it. When the opportunity came Mr. Kellogg was sent flying to Senator Borah and other Senators to ask what to do. At first the brave leader was for leaving the whole matter to Congress; then it was decided to accept, and to put up to Congress the question whether it would appropriate money for the necessary expense. Then it was suddenly declared in the press that the President had decided that it was useless for America to attend a land disarmament conference because we had nothing to disarm! On another page of this issue Frank Kent sets forth how the President and his fidus Achates, Mr. Butler, have stultified themselves in the matter of Senator La Follette. As for the threatened punishment to be visited upon Mr. Lewis of the Miners' Union for his "impudent" letter to the President and the threat to ask Congress to take away the right to strike from men in essential industries, not one word has been heard—precisely as we prophesied in our issue of December 9. Yet both of these things were heralded in the pro-Coolidge press as certain to come; the President was boiling with indignation! As for the World Court, Mr. Coolidge is putting up no fight at all. If the proposal goes through it will not be because of any leadership or any utterance of the President. That timid, shrinking violet must now decide what to do with twenty recommendations sent to him by the Tariff Commission. It is a safe bet that he will run from them or defer action just as long as he possibly can.

BUT POLITICS the President can play. For months past the tipster services from Washington had been announcing that in response to an "overwhelming demand" from the South the President was going to appoint a Southern member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This fact was mysteriously coupled with the nomination of Thomas F. Woodlock to the same commission, with the prophecy that this would result in Mr. Woodlock's confirmation by the Senate, which refused to confirm him last spring. The prophecy has come true. A Southerner, Richard B. Taylor of Mobile, was nominated for a place on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and simultaneously the name of Mr. Woodlock was sent back to the Senate. A Washington newspaper and Senator Blease have both declared that this is a straight-out deal to obtain the confirmation of Mr. Woodlock by Southern Democratic votes. It will be interesting to watch the outcome. Mr. Woodlock is entirely unfitted, by reason of past associations, for a place on the commission. The progressive Republicans refused to accept him last spring. The simple question now is whether the President has bought enough Democratic votes. If the nomination goes through there will be no denying the deal and the fact that the Democratic Party has sunk one degree lower in the scale of political decency.

IS PROFESSIONAL RIGHTEOUSNESS PROFITABLE? Here comes John W. Davis, Leaguer and regretter for "backward America," and professes deep indignation that the Government should venture to assail the legality and morality of the notorious Chemical Foundation transaction, by which the magnates of the chemical industry, conniving with A. Mitchell Palmer and Francis P. Garvan, Alien Property custodians, transferred from government custodianship to themselves nearly 5,000 German patents, worth many millions, for a paltry $50 each—all this months after the armistice. The Government now seeks to show in the United States Supreme Court that the custodian could not sell to a dummy corporation, of which he was president, that he was still a trustee notwithstanding his power of sale and therefore was bound to obtain fair prices, that the sales committee of distinguished names was a smoke-screen for perpetrating a giant conspiracy to appropriate private property, and that not only the private owners but also the United States Government has been robbed of valuable property. The Chemical Foundation, smoke-screen for the dye magnates, alleges in effect that to make these charges is to question the integrity of distinguished names, and that in any event President Wilson, who actually was permitted to know little about the matter, and Frank L. Polk, his alter ego, had the power, if they saw fit, thus to give away this valuable private property. To sustain the deal the lower courts were impelled to hold that the statute gave the custodian the power to confiscate the property, a conclusion which we believe to be false.

AN ENORMOUS AMOUNT of money has been and is being spent by the Chemical Foundation (really the chemical industry), worshipers of the god of property, to sustain one of the most disreputable spoliations of private property ever recorded. Thus does war and its aftermath deprave private and public morality. At no other time could responsible people fail to see that the mere effort to defend or palliate so brazen a transaction is a disgrace to every one connected with it. But it is interesting to find that those who defend it are among the great uplifters, Leaguers and World Courters, and advocates of rostrum righteousness generally wherever the chance offers. How many of them profess to be shocked by the Soviet Government and oppose its recognition because it confiscated private property! How many of them serve on committees to study the crime wave! Ex-Attorney General Stone, in attacking the Chemical Foundation scheme in the Circuit Court of Appeals, said that "it will be a dark day for this republic when public officials, charged with public duties and responsibilities, can do the acts disclosed by this record without any consequences to them and those who claim under them." If the scheme is sustained by the Supreme Court, which we hesitate to believe, it would seem to be fitting to open the jails and let out the mere undergraduate "pikers." They would be only tyros in the art. And yet John W. Davis actually takes a brief for this conspiracy to defraud and tries to conceal the issue by declaring that it is an attempt to besmirch the name of Woodrow Wilson!

THE DISCREDITING OF POINCARE, as well as the reputation of Archibald Cary Coolidge of Foreign Affairs for editorial fairness, is advanced by the publication in the January issue of an incisive reply to Poincaré's self-administered dash of whitewash in the October number in regard to the origins of the World War. Ex-Chancellor Wilhelm Marx buries Poincaré under cumulative proof of the overt guilt of the latter in conjunction with Izvolski. Poincaré's chief excuse—an allegation of the spurious nature of the Russian documents—is demolished by citing Sazonov's recent admission of their authenticity. Dr. Marx shows how the Triple Alliance became weaker from 1900 to 1914, while the superiority of the Entente in armaments is statistically demonstrated. Particular stress is laid upon the collusion between Izvolski and Poincaré, covering such points as Izvolski's diplomatic failures up to 1912 in his plans to secure the Straits for Russia; his preliminary negotiations with Poincaré; the latter's grant of a free hand in the Balkans to Russia; the corruption of the French press by Russian money; the recall of the pacific Georges Louis from St. Petersburg and his replacement by the belligerent Delcassé and Paléologue; the French loans to Russia from 1912-1914 with the condition that the money would be used to increase the size of the Russian army and navy and to build more railroads to the German frontier; and the Franco-Russian war aims, formulated in 1914 or earlier, which involved the dismemberment of Germany and the destruction of her economic power. Dr. Marx also points out the Serbian responsibility for the murder of Franz Ferdinand; the belligerent attitude of Poincaré on his St. Petersburg visit, with his grant of a blank check to Russia in the Austro-Serbian crisis; the actual precipitation of hostilities by the Russian general mobilization on July 30. We believe that the distinguished retailers of the mythology of 1914-18 will be more wary henceforth.

"WE OF THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY have no idea, no knowledge, of another war, but we of the Conservative Party believe that if another crisis should arise which might threaten our country—which we do not expect—this country should not send troops out of Canada without the people being consulted." Thus Arthur Meighan, leader of the Conservative opposition in the Canadian Parliament. As if to call additional attention to so remarkable a statement he later repeated it in the Bagot constituency in Quebec before a French audience. The statement is being accepted by the bulk of the Canadian press as meaning that Canada will not go into another war on behalf of the mother country until not only the Canadian Parliament has been consulted but the people themselves have spoken in a referendum. This is a remarkable change of face as well as an inspiring step forward, for Mr. Meighan in September, 1922, made a speech at Toronto in which he denounced the then government of Canada for not having immediately replied to Great Britain's query whether Canada would stand by in the event of trouble with Turkey with the message: "Ready, aye, ready; we stand by you." He was then aghast at the idea that the Canadians should determine for themselves whether they would or would not go along with England in a given case. His change of position must be taken at its face value, because there is no special political reason or emergency to make him take so radical a stand. Moreover, he is probably to be the Premier of Canada in 1926. Thus, he promises to do what Woodrow Wilson declared was impossible in 1917—to use the democratic method of finding out whether the people of a country wish to go to war before condemning their sons to death and disablement.

MR. HOOVER has told the Society of Mechanical Engineers that America spends ten times as much for cosmetics in a year as it does for pure research. It is all very well, he says, to glorify America for its progress in applied science and general industrial development, but the backbone of that development—research in pure science—is lamentably weak. "Instead of leading all other countries in the advancement of scientific knowledge, the United States occupies a position far in the rear of the majority of European nations." He cites the work of Maxwell on Hertzian waves, of Becquerel on radio activity, of Einstein as examples of pure science carried on with no incentive except a divine curiosity but often resulting in applications of the highest practical importance. Radio, for instance, would have been unthinkable without Maxwell's work. We second Mr. Hoover's plea with all possible emphasis and only wish that charity might have begun at home. In Mr. Hoover's Department of Commerce, especially in the Bureau of Standards, pure research has had a hard time of it in competition with commercial problems and direct aid and comfort to industry. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is Mr. Hoover's favorite son, rather than the scientific work of the Bureau of Standards. Appropriations for research, we are told, have not been warmly recommended. And morale is not helped when new scientific discoveries appear more in connection with the Secretary's name than with that of the scientist who made the discovery. If Mr. Hoover is in earnest—and we believe that he is—let him lead the way by giving all possible support to that devoted group of scientists who call him chief.

THE DEATH OF FRANK MUNSEY is especially interesting because of his ownership of two New York dailies, the Sun and the Telegram. In journalism he was essentially a dealer in dailies. An ardent Progressive in the Bull Moose campaign, one of the two men who induced Roosevelt to bolt from the Republican Party by promises of money and support, Mr. Munsey was normally extremely conservative and was responsible for the production of newspapers whose editorial opinions were of little or no value, while they themselves were dull. At Mr. Munsey's door must be laid, too, the death of two historic papers, the Herald and the Sun, which should have survived and could have had they fallen into other hands. Mr. Munsey, himself, was an extraordinarily successful merchant; the owner of the Mohican grocery and meat stores, he kept them to standards of efficiency and scientific management which were unsurpassed. His early struggle to establish himself in the magazine field of New York showed that he was possessed of extraordinary courage, tenacity, and determination to succeed. The struggle he made after arriving in New York, as an unknown lad from Maine with but forty dollars in his pocket, deserved success, and no one could begrudge him the power that he achieved. But when he entered the newspaper field he did not help at all the cause of American journalism. His death without immediate heirs makes possible the establishment of another daily like the old Evening Post—if there are those who care about having one.

IN CALIFORNIA, where the plums are as big as apples and the apples as big as grapefruit and the grapefruit as big as watermelons and the watermelons as big as a Ford runabout, it is not unexpected that there should be an extraordinary number of geniuses. Thus one is not surprised to hear that 1,000 phenomenally gifted children have been discovered in that land of plenty who are to be educated in a super-university surrounded, presumably, by other geniuses as instructors in an attempt to "give genius a chance," to provide for it a course of instruction in an atmosphere uncorrupted by the mediocre children who fill our public schools. Only one thing is needed to start the university going, and that is a mere $5,000,000, which in California is doubtless swept up by every bank charwoman twice a day and thrown into the waste-basket. Probably by the time these lines are written five times $5,000,000 will have been assembled and the university will be well under way. California is like that. And when the little geniuses are all educated and go out to conquer a waiting world, unlike other hopeful university graduates, they will really do something big, something big enough even to be a credit to California. They will not spend their time selling sewing machines or life insurance or even real estate; they will not become bond salesmen or school teachers. They will be different, because they are California's biggest and best product. If there are any unkind Easterners to point out that California genius may be all right, but that California fruit has more looks than taste, away with them. They do not deserve to be uplifted or helped by educated genius and probably they will not be.

Budgets, Taxes, and Waste

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE and Secretary Mellon are very proud of the tax reductions they have already accomplished and are now about to carry further with the aid of Congress. The President ascribes them in considerable degree to the budget system. "Without it," he says, "all the claim of economy would be a mere pretense." He cites the reduction of the departmental estimates for ordinary purposes—from $4,068,000,000 in 1922 to $3,156,000,000 for 1927—as the best possible proof of the value of the budget and of the Controller General. That the control of the budget has accomplished much good and that its establishment has been a long step toward scientific control of our national finances no one will, we think, deny. But while the machinery of budget-making may be all that is desired, the question must still be raised, as with every other governmental device, whether those who are operating it are doing so wisely and to the public interest. Neither a reduction of taxes nor of the budget is necessarily a good thing. It depends where the savings are made.

Take the example of Belgium. American financiers have just compelled a cut of $350,000,000 in the budget of that country as the price of advancing funds to stabilize the Belgian currency. Is the cut made in the cost of the useless army which could successfully defend Belgium against no adjacent Power, save possibly Holland? Not at all. The outcry in Belgium against the United States which has arisen since the facts became known and have been officially admitted by M. Vandervelde is reported to be in large measure due to the cutting of the appropriations for important social and cultural purposes. Belgium naturally resists any outside interference with her budget. She has a right to feel keenly, after all her experiences and hardships since 1914, that if some of the most important social services of the country are to be sacrificed to such an extent this particular budget-saving becomes not a blessing but an evil, the responsibility for which must be shared both by the Belgian Cabinet and the American financiers. Similarly it is of the utmost importance to find out in our own case whether the cuts are made in the right place and whether the taxes to be remitted are the proper ones.

A perusal of the President's budget messages and of Secretary Mellon's statements leaves us still unconvinced on more than one point. Thus the saving in taxes is to be only $336,000,000, less than 10 per cent of the amount to be raised in the coming fiscal year. Now, to maintain that the lopping off of $336,000,000 is necessary, as the President suggests, on the theory that undue taxation is confiscation of private property, seems to us absurd. So does the hoary old Mellon contention that if our high taxation is not reduced there will not be sufficient money available for new financing or for new business enterprises. The ridiculousness of that view is evident if we but consider the daily export of American capital to Europe and the willingness of the lenders to export a good deal more if Mr. Mellon were not using his control of private loans to compel debt adjustments—as he himself admits—and if we consider the almost incredible sums now being put into building enterprises. Thus, during the month of November, building and engineering contracts awarded in the thirty-six Eastern States amounted to $464,683,100, the highest recorded figure for any November and 23 per cent greater than the figure for November of last year. In New York and northern New Jersey alone the amount so invested rose to $160,629,500.

In the light of these figures anyone who maintains that it was necessary to cut $336,000,000 from the tax levy to keep business from being hamstrung through lack of capital is seeking to throw dust in people's eyes. The cut may be defended on other grounds—that too large surpluses make for waste and extravagance or that the individual burden of the small taxpayer is thereby reduced. But it cannot be truthfully alleged, as both Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Mellon have said, that it is necessary to make these cuts in order to keep business going and earning enough surplus so that new enterprises may be founded and old ones expanded. Let anyone read the list of extra dividends declared in the last few days in Wall Street and he will be convinced.

It must be noted, too, that this cut in taxes is made with little reference to the budget figures. The President has asked for appropriations for total expenditures for the fiscal year 1926-27 of $3,494,222,308.44. If that budget should be adhered to it would mean a cutting of government expenditures by $124,452,691. As a matter of fact, the budget for 1925-1926 called for only $3,267,551,000, but extraordinary or unforeseen expenditures will, it is now estimated, compel the government to disburse $3,618,675,000 by July first next—a little difference of $351,124,000 between the guess and the fulfilment. Contrasting, therefore, the original estimate for 1925-1926 and the proposed budget for 1926-1927 of this great administration of economy, it appears that so far from being a reduction the new budget is actually an increase over the old of $226,671,308.40.

Doubtless the public will continue to believe that Mr. Coolidge is economizing. As a matter of fact, if he really wishes to economize, he could not only keep this year's budget at last year's figures but he could reduce it still further. After solemnly assuring the American Legion that no army or navy protects a country from attack, and in the face of the coming disarmament conference, he has allotted an additional $20,000,000 to the navy while cutting the army by $4,124,000. The Veterans' Bureau is to receive $53,000,000 more and the pension roll goes up $8,000,000. These are necessary expenditures and merely the forerunners of still vaster ones to come. Others are waste.

The thoroughly uncivilized character of the budget, as well as the cost of wars, past and future, appears from the figures accompanying the budget compiled by the Budget Bureau itself. From this it appears that the general functions of government receive only 3.35 cents out of every dollar spent by the government, whereas 16.32 cents go to the national defense and 16.55 cents go to military pensions, retirement pay, and other expenditures growing out of past wars. Only 5.60 cents is spent upon public works and 7.40 cents on other civil functions. For our costly mercantile fleet we spend 1.88, for public debt retirement from ordinary receipts we spend 14.76, and for the interest on our public debts 22.75 cents. The government thus admits that out of every dollar 70.38 cents goes to wars past and present.

France's Danger

TO the many persons in this country who rightly look upon France as the leader of Latin civilization, and a center from which during most of the modern era intelligence, liberty, and sanity have been diffused into the world, the present plight of the republic is distressing. When Louis Loucheur became Minister of Finance our journals were sure that he would find a way out of the swamp of debt. Now they have forgotten those rosy predictions but are equally sure of Paul Doumer, the new financial head, and are acclaiming the proposal of the industrialists of northern France to mortgage their properties in return for an American loan of 10,000,000,000 francs. That and a proposal to lease the government tobacco monopoly to American interests are the only financial suggestions of any importance which the Doumer ministry has brought forth.

Both suggestions are inadequate financially and dangerous politically. Ten billion francs sounds like considerable money but it is a trifle beside the 300,000,000,000 francs which France owes or even the 75,000,000,000 francs of this amount which is in short-term securities and is causing most of the immediate embarrassment. Even if such a loan were larger, it could afford only temporary respite financially while it would certainly put the control of the government into the hands of the business men who guaranteed the money, with added pressure from the American bankers who supplied the cash. Sale of the tobacco monopoly would be equally objectionable. It might net some actual cash over and above what the government is now making but it would put a big national resource and hundreds of employees under direct foreign control. We repeat what we have said before that France's only hope of solvency is to raise money within—probably through some form of a levy on capital. To seek loans in America is merely to inflate further her gigantic debt, to put her head in the noose of Wall Street, to pave the way for another Dawes Plan.

And while successive ministries temporize with the financial situation the political dangers to republicanism increase. The very fact that the proposal of the northern industrial interests was discussed seriously in France—although it seems now to be discredited—shows how susceptible the country is to plans which would subordinate Parliament to a super-government by a special clique. In order to make way for fascism it is first necessary to discredit representative government with the public, and a campaign in this direction is already on. An influential section of the Paris press is bitterly assailing Parliament, especially the Chamber of Deputies—the democratic branch. The Paris correspondent of the New York Times echoes this when he refers in a dispatch printed on December 19 to "that national menagerie known as the French Chamber," and he suggests how painlessly a coup d'etat might be effected when he continues calmly: "However, if the worse comes to the worst, President Doumergue is a gentleman who would dissolve the Chamber, with the consent of the Senate, which, if he and Briand and Poincaré decided was best, could undoubtedly be had." Once dissolved, the Chamber could be kept so by the simple expedient of continually postponing a new election.

Mass Opinion at Work

WE are witnessing an extraordinarily interesting spectacle in the massing of public opinion at Washington on behalf of American entry into the World Court. Hordes of women have descended upon the galleries of the Senate and are listening with intense eagerness to the debates upon this proposal. They are Democratic women and Republican women and independent women. Some have come of their own initiative, but the bulk of them are there as representatives of organizations committed to our joining the Court. In the main this demonstration is the result of most intensive public propaganda by societies such as the American Foundation of Mr. Bok and various other organizations for putting us into the League of Nations as well as the World Court. The outcome is going to throw a good deal of light upon whether we are going to be ruled henceforth by skilfully organized and directed intellectual groups fired by enthusiasm for a given cause, as prohibition was finally made the law of the land by the dragooning of legislators by enthusiasts for that cause.

Let us say at once that we have heard nothing to make us believe what some Senators seem to suspect—that there has been improper use of money. So far as we are aware the proponents and opponents of this legislation are entirely within their historic rights. There have been many similar efforts to try to influence Congress; the unusual thing about this one is the widespread character of the movement and the great advance in the technique of the campaign as a result no doubt of our experience in the art of nation-wide propaganda during the World War. The fire directed upon Congress now does not, of course, come only from women but from endless church organizations, from colleges, from societies of every kind and description. If the Senators had to take their cues simply by estimating superficially where the larger battalions stand, they would vote unanimously for the World Court. They are, however, experts in mass propaganda on a smaller scale by which they are constantly beset, and those who went through the successful fight to defeat our entry into the League of Nations are not likely to be stampeded by the tremendous demonstrations of hostile public opinion which they are daily encountering. Those Senators who are of the belief that their guide is their conscience, and that they are not in Washington merely to register what they conceive to be the wishes of all or a part of their constituents, will not be swayed by any demonstrations from the galleries or by the thousands of letters and telegrams which are pouring in upon them.

Senator Borah, for instance, cannot be won by any such mass attack nor by any presidential threatening or use of patronage. In his brilliant essay on Mr. Borah in the current Foreign Affairs Quarterly Walter Lippmann attributes his independence among other causes to the smallness of the home constituency the Senator from Idaho has to listen to. If it were a much larger one it would make no difference in this case. He will get the Court with the reservations he desires or vote against it if it costs him his seat. That is the position a legislator should always take, though very few take it. If communities desire to be represented by men who do as they are told and yield to more or less public pressure, they should pick such a man in advance. We have heard many complaints lately from regular Republicans at the appearance of a bloc system in Congress, but, granting their arguments, government by the crowd in the galleries or by telegrams and letters is something far worse. Of course constituents have the right to let their representatives know how they feel on any question, but to compel them to vote against their consciences or their beliefs is to substitute mass or mob rule for representative government.

The present situation seems to us to illustrate beyond dispute the need of a nation-wide referendum such as the Democratic Party called for at its last convention on the issue of our entering the League. It will be remembered that Newton D. Baker, prince of casuists, at once made an eloquent plea against the proposal, declaring that it would be unconstitutional and that no machinery for taking it existed. That opinion came with sorry humor from one of the men who succeeded in creating overnight a machinery to take a census of the young Americans they desired to select for death in a needless and useless foreign war, but if it is true let us proceed at once to find a way to let the people speak their minds on vital issues.

There are three great issues before us now upon which the people ought to speak: the World Court, the League of Nations, and prohibition. In the case of the World Court we are not at all clear that the bulk of the people want it. The privileged classes in the East appear to, but we are not so certain about others. Hence we should like to see the energy that is now sending telegrams, letters, and delegations to Washington put into creating a machinery by which we can find out what the people think.

Rare Jane Austen

JUST a century and a half ago, in a small village rectory in Hampshire, a little girl was born, the youngest in a family of seven children. Five brothers and a sister had preceded her; they with a few neighbors were to make up most of her acquaintance during the forty-two years of her life; she traveled little, never leaving England, never, indeed, going further from Steventon where she was born than to Bath, to London, to Southampton, and finally to Winchester. If ever a life was lived quietly and unobtrusively, it was hers; she never married; it is not known that she ever had a lover; she occupied herself with a little sewing, a little dancing, a little household management. Except for one trick of fate, she differed not a bit from thousands of young women ushered into the world in December, 1775. But that trick was a rather important one; for at the age of twenty-one she happened to write "Pride and Prejudice."

In Winchester Cathedral, where Jane Austen is buried, her devoted family had laid a black marble stone on which they paid tribute to the piety, the unselfishness, the kindness, the charity and faith of their distinguished relative. These are qualities that none would wish now to deny her; but in the family grief at her untimely death they were probably stressed a little unduly and tended to crowd out certain other qualities not less important. If her novels tell little of her character, her letters reveal far more. At twenty she could write to her sister Cassandra:

> I danced twice with Warren last night, and once with Mr. Charles Watkins, and, to my inexpressible astonishment, I entirely escaped John Lyford. . . . You scold me so much in the nice long letter which I have this moment received from you that I am almost afraid to tell you how my Irish friend and I behaved. Imagine to yourself everything most profligate and shocking in the way of dancing and sitting down together. . . . I look forward with great impatience to it [the ball] as I rather expect to receive an offer from my friend in the course of the evening. I shall refuse him, however, unless he promises to give away his white coat. . . . Tell Mary that I make over Mr. Heartley and all his estate to her for her sole use and benefit in future, and not only him but all my other admirers into the bargain wherever she can find them, even the kiss which C. Powlett wanted to give me, as I mean to confine myself in future to Mr. Tom Lefroy, for whom I don't care sixpence.

This sort of high-spirited nonsense filled her letters; balls—the simplest country dances, one gathers—afternoon calls, walks, and gossip brought it forth; to praise she responded lightly: "I am very much flattered by your commendation of my last letter, for I wrote only for fame, and without any view to pecuniary emolument." The knowledge of human nature expressed in her novels is anticipated when she remarks: "Mr. Richard Harvey is going to be married; but as it is a great secret, and only known to half the neighborhood, you must not mention it."

It is recorded that the novels were written on a little writing-desk that their author could balance easily on her knee, and that the advent of callers or the necessity of performing any unimportant task temporarily suspended the production of literature. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the following casual mention of "Pride and Prejudice" under its earlier title: "I do not wonder at your wanting to read 'First Impressions' again, so seldom as you have gone through it, and that so long ago. I am much obliged to you for meaning to leave my old petticoat behind you. I have long secretly wished it might be done, but had not courage to make the request."

Even later, when the balls were long since over, Miss Austen was not without a certain caustic observation of her neighbors and a lively interest in what might be considered by some as trivial matters:

> I shall not tell you anything more of Wm. Digweed's china, as your silence on the subject makes you unworthy of it. Mrs. H. Digweed looks forward with great satisfaction to our being her neighbors. I would have her enjoy the idea to the utmost, as I suspect there will not be much in the reality. . . . Miss Hook is a well-behaved, genteelish woman; Mrs. Drew well-behaved, without being at all genteel. Mr. Wynne seems a chatty and rather familiar young man. . . . [I] mean to wear out my spotted muslin before I go. You will exclaim at this, but mine really has signs of feebleness, which, with a little care, may come to something. . . . You used me scandalously by not mentioning Edward Cooper's sermons. I tell you everything and it is unknown the mysteries you conceal from me.

So the letters ramble on. From the first, written in 1796, to the last in 1816 they are witty, gay, sharp, occupied with trifles that their writer's neatness and sly comments enliven, letters that must have been a delight to receive and a challenge to answer. It is indicated more than once that Cassandra's replies were worthy of them, but that lady, in giving her sister's epistles to a niece shortly before her own death in 1845, took care to destroy not only her own letters but every scrap of Jane's which she considered too personal for possible later publication. What remains gives an acceptably rounded picture of the younger Miss Austen—one that her biographers have often forgotten.

Ten Senators on the World Court

[In the issues of December 2, 9, and 16 The Nation published a series of articles by James N. Rosenberg on the question of American participation in the World Court, and on December 23 a reply by Manley Hudson. In order to round out the discussion, The Nation addressed to every member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a letter inviting a statement of views based on Mr. Rosenberg's series. In this letter the problem was outlined as follows:

We believe that a World Court cannot be an agency for peace if it is backed by power. We believe that Articles 13 and 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations give serious room for the claim that the decisions of the World Court as now constituted are capable of enforcement through the exercise of power by the League; we believe therefore that if the United States enters the World Court such entry should be conditioned upon a reservation making it clear beyond the remotest possibility of doubt that the efficacy of the decisions of the Court rests solely upon the sense of international honor and obligation of the litigant sovereign nations and not on military force or economic pressure.

We publish below the replies of ten members of the committee which show plainly the wide variety of views which the proposal for American participation must face in the Senate. The unqualified support of Senator Walsh, the clear-cut opposition of Senator Shipstead, and all the possible modifications of each are expressed in this symposium. The Nation plans to continue its discussion of the relation of the United States to the World Court with a series of three articles by William Hard, to be followed by a reply from Walter Lippmann.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

I entertain no doubt that, under Articles 12, 13, and 16, and especially in view of the amendments to the same now pending and partially ratified, the League of Nations claims the right and will have the power to use force in the enforcement of the decisions of the Court, including the advisory opinions. I am utterly opposed to the use of force or of economic sanctions in the enforcement of the decrees of an international court.

WILLIAM E. BORAH

I note your view that an additional reservation should be attached to the resolution of ratification. I cannot agree with you. It seems to me wholly unnecessary to attach any such condition as that suggested by you. It is plain as a pikestaff that the statute itself—and that is all that concerns us, for it is all to which we become a signatory—makes no provision whatever for the enforcement of the judgments of the Court either by peaceful or by warlike means. That a nation which belongs to the League may find itself in some embarrassment by virtue of certain provisions of the Covenant should a decision of the Court go against it may be true. That situation can be met only by modification of the Covenant of the League, and we certainly ought not to attempt to procure an amendment of the Covenant or make our adherence to the Protocol dependent upon the making of such amendment. Moreover, as you must know, there is not a chance that the Covenant can be amended so as to remove from it the so-called "sanctions."

Your proposition really, then, is, as I view it, that we do not go into the Court at all since you attach a condition that it is known in advance will not be met.

T. J. WALSH

I am not in favor of such a reservation as you suggest, or as suggested by Mr. Rosenberg in his articles in The Nation. There is not a word in the Court statute upon the subject of sanctions, either expressed or implied, and so far as that statute is concerned enforcement rests wholly upon public opinion.

The League of Nations is a treaty or agreement between a large group of nations, and if they choose to agree to enforce the judgments of this or any other court by sanctions, it is none of our affair. Our reservations have nothing whatever to do with the League of Nations, and we do not propose to deal with it in any form. The suggestion really is that we make a reservation against the Covenant of the League of Nations, which is not before us in any way. Any two or more nations may hereafter agree, if they choose, to enforce the decisions of the Court, without in any way violating any duty they might have internationally to the United States.

I. L. LENROOT

I have considered Mr. Rosenberg's most interesting articles on the Permanent Court. It seems to me that there may well be a distinction between the situation of the United States, when we shall have adhered to the Court, and that of adhering states which are League members. I can see the possibility of an inference of obligation on the part of member states to enforce obedience to a decree of the Court. This obligation, if it exists, would grow out of the Covenant of the League. It is not clear to me on what basis one could rest a contention that the United States would be so bound, for we have not subscribed the Covenant. If we are not bound, there is no liability which by reservation we should disclaim.

My own view has always been that a severance of Court from League is desirable in the interest of the former. I have become satisfied, however, that the only issue which the public can understand is the simple issue of adherence or non-adherence. On this issue I am for adherence, because I believe that the safety of the United States is in no sense involved and that, if severance is as important as I believe it to be, it can be effected by future pressure.

GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER

I agree with you that Articles 13 and 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations do give serious room for the claim that the decisions of the World Court as now constituted are capable of enforcement through the exercise of force under the auspices of the League.

Except for the fact that this force is to be exercised under the auspices of the League I would find no special fault with this situation; because my concept of a World Court is one with compulsory jurisdiction, codified law, and adequate sanctions.

GEORGE H. MOSES

In view of the fact that I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and in a few days the Senate will open discussion which will undoubtedly encompass every phase of the World Court participation, I prefer to withhold for the present any final comment.

Generally speaking, on the question you raise, I have always felt the reservation suggested by Mr. Hughes to the effect that our entry into the Court would not compel our assumption of any obligation under the Covenant of the League of Nations was sufficiently broad to cover any reasonable contingency.

WALTER E. EDGE

My attitude on the question of enforcing the decisions of the World Court was expressed in my resolution submitted to the Senate on March 5, 1925, containing these paragraphs:

Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the adhesion on the part of the United States to the said protocol of December 16, 1920, and the adjoined statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice (without [illegible] ting or agreeing to the optional clause for compulsory jurisdiction contained in said statute) and that the signature of the United States be affixed to the said Protocol; subject to the following reservations and understandings which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution, namely:

1. That such adhesion shall not be taken to involve any legal relation on the part of the United States to the League of Nations or the assumption of any obligations by the United States under the Covenant of the League of Nations constituting Part I of the Treaty of Versailles.

2. That the United States will participate through representatives designated for the purpose and upon an equality with the other states, members respectively of the Council and Assembly of the League of Nations, in any and all proceedings of either the Council or the Assembly for the election of judges or deputy judges of the Permanent Court of International Justice, or for the filling of [illegible]

3. That the United States will pay a fair share of the expenses of the Court as determined and appropriated from [illegible]

4. That the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice adjoined to the protocol shall not be amended without the consent of the United States.

[illegible] advisory opinions which may be rendered by the Court upon questions which the United States has not voluntarily submitted for its judgment.

The signature of the United States to the said Protocol shall not be affixed until the Powers signatory to such protocol shall have indicated, through an exchange of notes, their acceptance of the foregoing reservations and [illegible] to be [illegible] by the United States to the said protocol.

FRANK B. WILLIS

I have your letter regarding the World Court and I agree with you. I shall vote for the pending resolution, provided reservations are attached which will make it clear beyond doubt that the decisions of the Court are to be free from compulsion.

GEORGE P. MCLEAN

Property acquired by war is, under international law, held to be legally acquired. The business of the Court is to decide that loot acquired as a result of the last war has been legally acquired. Such a decision may be legal according to international law, but in view of the terms of the armistice such a decision by the Court cannot be one based upon justice. Therefore it seems to me that the Court is misnamed when it is called a court of justice.

To carry out the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles the League of Nations system is a very carefully planned program for making war. It is assumed, I take it, that such wars will be "just" wars, wars to uphold the "sanctity of treaties," and wars to "save democracy." Such wars under this program will be "legal" wars backed by the Court and the League.

Paragraph 1, Article 12, of the Covenant of the League of Nations reads as follows:

> The members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the Council [illegible] subject).

Here is a legalized method of going to war. The only reservation is there shall be no actual act of war until three months after the decision of the Court or report of the Council.

Paragraph 1, Article 13, of the Covenant of the League of Nations states:

> The members of the League agree that, whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

Article 16 of the Covenant of the League provides:

> Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Article 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League.
> It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League. (Italics mine.)

Here we have the sanctions for war to enforce settlement of controversies within the League. How does the Covenant propose to make war upon non-member nations who refuse to use and obey the machinery of the League? That we learn by reading Article 17 of the Covenant of the League of Nations:

> In the event of a dispute between a member of the League and a state which is not a member of the League, or between states not members of the League, the state or states not members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted the provisions of Articles 12 to 16, inclusive, shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the Council.
> If a state so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a member of the League, the provisions of Article 16 shall be applicable as against the state taking such action.

The power to enforce the decisions of the Court by war is therefore vested in the League of Nations by the treaty called the Covenant.

Thus we have a clear program for inaugurating all kinds of "legal" wars, on the assumption that the wars under this arrangement will be "legal" and under the further assumption that wars in the past have been "illegal." How many governments in the history of the world have started "illegal wars"? All of the governments that have started "illegal wars" please say "Aye"! Silence. All governments which have started "legal wars" only please say "Aye"! All governments of history in chorus shout "Aye"!

HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

I favor the adherence of the United States to the World Court with the reservations advocated by Presidents Harding and Coolidge and former Secretary of State Hughes. It seems to me that those reservations are sufficient to guarantee us entire freedom from the League of Nations, while at the same time permitting us to lend our tremendous influence toward the adjudication of questions involving world peace and coming before the Court.

The first of these reservations states that our entry into the Court "shall not be taken to involve any legal relation to the League of Nations, or the assumption of any obligations by the United States under the Covenant of the League of Nations."

It is perfectly plain to me that under these reservations we would not be obliged to employ force in enforcing the decisions of the Court. And since we recognize no authority of the League so far as our nation is concerned, I do not see that we should fear the use of force against us by the League of Nations after joining the World Court any more than we should fear it now when we have no connection with the Court.

My feeling is that our nation should not refuse to lend its great prestige and whole-hearted support to the advancement of what seems to be a sincere effort on the part of the nations of the world to set up a tribunal for the peaceful adjudication of international questions; and it seems to me that we can do so under the reservations proposed with entire safety to our own national welfare.

Whitewashing the Air-Grafters

By H. L. SCAIFE

(Copyright, 1925, by the Author)

FAILURE of the Lampert House committee and the Morrow aircraft board to consider malversation and charges of the existence of an aircraft monopoly leaves the findings of the Thomas Senate committee, filed August 22, 1918,[1] as the last and only expression of an official investigation that has undertaken to hear testimony in support of charges of the existence of an air trust.

Neither the Lampert committee nor the Morrow board considered available evidence which in a measure would have accounted for the difference between what was legitimately spent and the results accomplished, and their reports very closely concur in recommendations favorable to a perpetuation of an aircraft monopoly and further enormous expenditures before the demoralizing conditions depicted in both reports are cleaned up. The findings of these committees, published almost simultaneously, raise controversial issues of minor importance that are apt to distract attention from the fundamental questions emphasized in these articles:

1. Who got the money?
2. What has been done with those who got the money?
3. What is going to be done with those who let the guilty escape?

The Morrow board filed its report on December 2, the report of the Lampert committee being made on December 14, nineteen months after that committee had been directed by the House of Representatives[2] to conduct an investigation which should have answered these questions, instead of going far afield into phases of the aircraft subject which were not within the scope of the contemplated inquiry.

The indifference of the Lampert committee to the serious business it had in hand is shown by the fact that it did not begin its formal hearings until nine months after it had been appointed. The record shows that visits of the committee to air-service plants were postponed last summer, "because of intensely hot weather"[3] and that

> It was deemed impractical to bring the committee together during the recess because of the exigencies of the fall campaign, as the members were so busy with matters of immediate importance to them.

The findings of the Lampert committee report that the total expenditures for the Army and Navy Air Services for the five years, 1920 to 1924 inclusive, were $424,234,107.90[5]; that "the use of airplanes designed and built in the year 1918 and earlier constitutes a very large proportion of the machines used in the army and navy"; and the committee concurs in the findings of the Lassiter board, made in 1923, as "a fair basis for the present study of our administrative methods" and that "its findings as to the conditions of our air service are substantially true today."[6]

The report of the Lassiter board, as quoted by the Lampert committee, states:

> After an exhaustive study of the situation the committee reports that an alarming condition in the Air Service exists, due to shortage of flying personnel and equipment, which, if allowed to continue, will very soon cause this important combatant arm to reach a condition which will cause it to be negligible as being any national defense.

Without accounting for the disappearance of such enormous amounts of money without tangible results, the Lampert report recommends, in addition to the usual appropriations, the expenditure of not less than $100,000,000 in a five-year program for "the procurement of new flying equipment, constructed by the civilian industry."[7] The committee reports that it has found no corruption, that an aircraft conspiracy does not exist, that the legality of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association and the cross-license agreement should now be accepted as "conclusive," and that the "save-harmless" clause in all air contracts is basically sound.[8] The committee recommends that "the Federal Government cease competing with the civilian aircraft industry in the construction of aircraft, engines, and accessories"; and that "the industry be assisted in the procurement of non-commercial supplies, either through the Government as debits on procurement contracts or the grouping of purchases within the industry."[9]

Members of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association who are the main beneficiaries of government aircraft contracts may be accepted as synonymous with the "industry." Concerning the alleged impoverished conditions of the "industry" the Lampert committee quotes ex-Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, as saying the contractors are "hanging on by their eyelids."[10] The Lampert committee reports:[11]

> In fact, there is general agreement from all of the witnesses, whether from the Government, the industry, or outside, that the aircraft industry, instead of fattening on government contracts, is being steadily starved to death.

Stated briefly, the Lampert committee recommends all the things that are necessary to continue placing aircraft contracts in the hands of men who wrecked the Government's aviation program during the war and have repeated the offense since the war; and the committee has failed to force an accounting.

Two of the most obnoxious features of aircraft contracts to independent manufacturers and inventors are the cross-license agreement and the "save-harmless" clause, around which the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association, organized on July 17, 1917, has been able to make effective its alleged monopoly of aircraft contracts. In connection with the cross-license agreement a form of license was adopted for those desiring or compelled to be associated with it, the scheme resulting in a surrender of patents to the association on terms prescribed by that association. The "save-harmless" clause inserted in these government contracts protects the members of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association in the use of patents of those who refuse to accept the conditions of participation in contracts prescribed by the alleged monopoly. By this clause the Government agrees that in case the contractor infringes patents that do not belong to the contractor, the United States will hold the contractor harmless, with the result that the only recourse of the unfortunate inventor, deprived of remedy by injunction, is in the tedious and expensive process of establishing his rights in the Court of Claims, where he finds to oppose him the legal machinery of the Government, backed by the resources of the United States, in litigation that may last for years. A definite instance as to how the "save-harmless" clause is used as a club over the inventor, even if in despair he offers to give his patent rights to the Government, is shown in the official records.[12] As long as their products can be sold and patents can be infringed with impunity, where is the financial need of the air trust to encourage invention?

It will thus be seen why the Thomas Senate committee predicted seven years ago that the cross-license agreement would lead to the discouragement of invention and the inevitable control of the aircraft industry by the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association or by some other interest through its agency. There has been no change in the operation of the cross-license agreement since it was condemned by the Thomas Senate committee, except that the Thomas Senate committee was informed that it was no longer used, when in fact it has never been abrogated and occurs in aircraft contracts today.[13] The story of how the cross-license agreement originated, the names of those responsible, and the alleged deception through which Attorney General Gregory rendered a tentative opinion under the stress of war, countenancing the Manufacturers' Association and the cross-license agreement, was exposed on the floor of the House of Representatives on February 23, 1924.[14]

As to the opinion of former Attorney General Gregory, which the Lampert committee cites in justification of the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association and the cross-license agreement, the chairman of the Thomas Senate committee declared on the floor of the United States Senate seven years ago:[15]

> . . . I am satisfied in my own mind, at least, that but for the emergency, but for the necessity of airplanes, and airplanes as soon as possible, this contract never would have passed the approving scrutiny of the Department of Justice.

In an exhaustive analysis[16] Senator Thomas declared that this opinion of the Attorney General "seems to damn this contract with very faint praise indeed" and, in the closing of his remarks, the chairman of the Senate committee declared:[17]

> It looks like profiteering without any limitation, and I fear that much of the difficulties and disappointments which the nation has encountered in attempting to carry out its aircraft program is due to the fact that all these conditions bestride the industry like a colossus.

Audits of aircraft contracts showing enormous overpayments to contractors and the failure of the Department of Justice to institute civil and criminal action were exposed on the floors of Congress in 1922,[18] resulting with other disclosures in the establishment of the War Transactions Section in the Department of Justice, for which Congress has made appropriations totaling $2,700,000.[19]

If the findings of the Lampert committee are correct in the clean bill of health they gave to our aircraft contractors, then why have the members of that committee permitted without protests such appropriations for the civil and criminal prosecution of these war-fraud cases?

Among the specific charges for investigation placed in the record of the House of Representatives when the Lampert committee was appointed was a chain of documentary evidence offered to show how the prosecution of the case of the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation was blocked after full hearings in the War Department covering a period of two years and after the case had been placed in the hands of the Department of Justice on October 26, 1921, with the request that litigation be instituted to protect the interests of the United States and that "only a court which possessed full powers to render a final decision and enforce it can satisfactorily cope with such a situation."[20]

The official records[21] show that on June 16, 1921, Charles Hayden, an official of the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation, wrote a letter to the then Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, containing the following reference to this case:

> Ordinarily I would hate to bring these matters to your personal attention, but the way the general situation has been developing in the last six months, it seems to me that everything that can be done by cooperation between bankers and the Government to inspire confidence in a legitimate way should be done, and that is why I feel a perfectly clear conscience in giving you this little additional bother.

On June 22, 1921, Hon. John W. Weeks, then Secretary of War, replied to this letter of Charles Hayden and among other things stated:

> Whatever decision may be reached by the Air Service section, you should understand, is not conclusive. Not only is the approval of a higher officer required, and even if that approval is obtained, there is a further appeal to myself. . . .

Again, on November 23, 1921, two days after Secretary Weeks had been informed by a memorandum from the Assistant Secretary of War[22] that "in view of this state of affairs the case has passed beyond the control and jurisdiction of the War Department,"[23] Secretary Weeks among other things wrote to Charles Hayden as follows:[24]

> I have not thought of the case in which you are interested since I wrote you last June, assuming that it was proceeding satisfactorily. I will see Mr. Hoyt[25] some day next week if he will call my secretary and make an appointment. In the meantime I have requested that no further immediate action be taken by the Department of Justice until I have had a talk with Mr. Hoyt.

On January 21, 1922, Guy D. Goff, then assistant to the Attorney General, wrote the following to the attorneys of the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation:[26]

> After thorough consideration I have to inform you that in the opinion of the Attorney General the case is one in which it is necessary to institute litigation to protect the interest of the Government.

The case was withdrawn from the hands of the United States attorney who had been instructed to proceed more than four years ago[27] and, notwithstanding the appropriations made by Congress for the prosecution of such cases, the case of the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation and many others in which malversation was charged were not investigated by the Lampert committee or the Morrow board. In the face of such records which had been briefed and made available to these investigating committees before they began their work,[28] Congress and the public must now consider with serious concern how the Lampert committee, without an investigation in the premises, could even ignorantly report[29] that

> The most searching investigation on the part of the committee discloses not the slightest ground for the charge that the Air Service procedure is corrupt.

In the unanimous report of the Morrow board, each of the nine members has placed himself on record as having been furnished the printed record of the testimony taken by the Lampert committee and of having the opportunity of examining the testimony taken in the various other hearings before congressional committees. The Morrow committee was, thus, aware that there were fifty-three witnesses[30] uncalled whose names had been furnished as having information in regard to the alleged air trust.

In placing the war-time production at more than 16,000 airplanes, the Morrow board has failed to realize that such statistics include penguins that could not fly and production that went to the junk pile. Similarly misleading information given to the public was among the grounds urged by Charles E. Hughes in recommending that E. A. Deeds be called to answer before a court martial.[31] The testimony of General Pershing and others long ago established the fact that at the time of the armistice not a single American-made fighting plane had reached France and that only 196 De Haviland 4-s, which could not be used in pursuit, were at the battle-front.[32]

In the praise by the Morrow board of the "flaming coffins," produced during the war and still in use after being reconditioned, the report states:

> While the charge has been made in the public press that fliers have been compelled to fly in unsafe machines, no evidence of any such case has been submitted to us.

If aircraft depreciates as fast as is claimed when new appropriations are being sought from Congress, such of these De Haviland machines as are still in use are less safe now than they were six years ago when Eddie Rickenbacker, America's leading ace, declared:[33]

> From every side Fokkers were pouncing upon the clumsy Liberty machines, which, with their criminally constructed fuel tanks, offered so easy a target to the incendiary bullets of the enemy that their unfortunate pilots called this boasted achievement of our Aviation Department their "flaming coffins." During that one brief flight over Grande Pré I saw three of these crude machines go down in flames, an American pilot and an American gunner in each flaming coffin," dying this frightful and needless death. . . .
> . . . Many a gallant life was lost to American aviation during those early months of 1918, the responsibility for which must lie heavily upon some guilty conscience.

Of the seven recommendations of the Morrow board to regulate the aircraft industry, which might be worthy of consideration if government contracts were freed of monopolistic tendencies, five under present conditions carry on their face the sign of the dollar; they look to a recognition of the aircraft monopoly to the exclusion of independent manufacturers and inventors. In these recommendations, it must be considered that under present conditions the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association and the aircraft industry are practically synonymous terms, and particular attention needs to be paid to the words that are here italicized:

> 2. Production orders be given only to companies which maintain design staffs of reasonable size and keep them active. . . .
> 5. During a period of production of a type accepted as a standard there be placed a succession of small orders for experimental designs to be given limited service tests, the best of these designs produced during a two or three year period being adopted as the next standard. Such orders, distributed among firms having design and production staffs of proved competence, should be awarded at a liberal price, high enough to cover all of the overhead expense involved in the upkeep of the design and experimental departments.
> 6. Existing statutes covering the procurement of supplies and requiring competitive bidding be modified where necessary to allow putting the recommendations previously made into effect.

The members of the alleged air trust have built up their plants and organizations through the aid of government finance to the exclusion of the pioneer manufacturers. These recommendations of the Morrow board will tend to make it impossible for an independent manufacturer to qualify for government work, a condition which already exists and which the Morrow report seeks to have legalized.

The constructive recommendations in the report of the Lampert committee and the Morrow board need not be considered until the wreckage is swept away and a firm foundation is presented on which to build. The old propaganda to forget the past has been effective, but there is no line of demarkation between the past and the present, or where the debacle started and where it will end.

The suppression of truth in a government inquiry, an obstruction of justice, or a failure to perform a public duty by any official or employee on the pay roll of the United States comes under the general conspiracy statute[34] if two or more persons enter into an agreement that would defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose.

In 1910 the Supreme Court of the United States made the following statement in its opinion in confirming an indictment charging a conspiracy to give to the public an incorrect official report:[35] public with correct information, its whole purpose would not only be prevented but actually reversed if the department issued incorrect reports. A conspiracy to cause incorrect monthly reports to be published would defraud the United States, because it would change its department from an agency to enlighten the public into an agency to mislead it. It would be as if wreckers, in combination with persons connected with the location of channel buoys or with lighthouses, were to combine to move the buoys or extinguish the lights.

America and Mosul

By LOUIS FISCHER

[On December 15 the Council of the League of Nations decided by unanimous vote to give Mosul to Iraq, which is under mandate to Great Britain. The economic background of this decision is described in the following article.]

London, December 1

THE United States is not a member of the League of Nations, nor does the State Department want Mosul as a colony, nor should America be interested in advancing the territorial claims either of Kemal Pasha or King George. Nevertheless it may develop that the voice of Washington and New York, the still small voice whispered behind the scenes, will be decisive in the determination of the Mosul boundary dispute which, not so long ago, almost involved the two contending parties in a war—and may yet.

Observers received the first hint of the diplomatic storm that was brewing from an innocent little announcement made on November 10 at the annual meeting of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, by Sir Charles Greenway, its president. Sir Charles, in replying to a question, declared that the stocks of the Turkish Petroleum Company, which has a concession from the Bagdad cabinet for the exploitation of all the oil resources of Iraq (including Mosul if the British case should triumph), were held "as to 47½ per cent by the Anglo-Persian Company, as to 22½ per cent by the Royal Dutch Company, as to 25 per cent by the French group, and as to 5 per cent by Mr. Gulbenkian."

That was all. To the uninitiated this means nothing. But it was interesting to watch the London papers. For a day or two they were either napping or ignorant of the significance of Sir Charles's word. Then the awakening.

The importance of Greenway's statement was the deduction it permitted that the Standard Oil was no longer a participant in the Turkish Petroleum Company. Yet for almost three years the entire world had been under the impression that it owned about 25 per cent of the shares. The Anglo-Persian president had, apparently, simply read the House of Rockefeller out of this international company which held a lease to invaluable petroleum fields. This situation became even more mystifying when the cables brought a denial from Walter C. Teagle, chairman of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Company. Mr. Teagle told the correspondents that his concern had not relinquished its holding in the Turkish Petroleum. Yet Greenway had said that the Standard Oil was not in it, and never had been for that matter. What was the meaning of all this?

Mosul oil has been the object of diplomatic and private capitalistic controversy for almost a quarter of a century. In 1888 the Germans, through the Deutsche Bank, received a concession to build the first section of the Bagdad railway. In 1903 the Porte granted permission to extend the line to Basra, thus imperiling Britain's hold on the Persian Gulf and the Anglo-Persian's oil-fields in south Persia, and threatening to bring Germany dangerously near to India. The next year the concession was made to include all the oil resources which might be discovered on either side of the line. England objected strenuously, and soon brought her friends, France and Russia, to her aid. This entente effectively barred the way to the execution of the German project. Years of diplomatic squabbling and business dickering followed. In the end, in March, 1914, the dispute was settled, as far as oil was concerned, by the organization of the Turkish Petroleum, 50 per cent of the shares of which were to be held by the Anglo-Persian, 25 per cent by the Royal Dutch Shell, and 25 per cent by the Germans. The San Remo oil agreement of April, 1920, gave the German share to a consortium of sixty-seven French companies.

The moment the San Remo pact became public the Standard Oil rose up in arms. Had not the United States contributed to the successful issue of the world conflict? Were not its nationals therefore entitled to a part of the spoils? What right had France and England to divide the petroleum of Iraq, a country conquered by force during the period of hostilities? Washington insisted on the "open door" for American oil trusts.

For eighteen months, from the middle of 1920 to the end of 1921, the battle of notes raged. The United States refused to give its approval to the Mesopotamia and Palestinian mandates which the League of Nations was intending to grant Great Britain unless the "open door" principle was accepted by the mandatory Power, and although America was no member of the League it goes without saying that that body as well as England feared to defy the State Department. The mandates remained unratified. The situation in the Near East grew chaotic; the Arabs were restive, and the Zionists chagrined, while actually war clouds gathered over the Anglo-American horizon. Serious journals fretted over the possibilities of a break. Yet neither Colby nor his successor Hughes on the one hand, nor Lord Curzon of Kedleston on the other, were willing to yield.

The correspondence was long and vitriolic. Curzon did not fail to point out the irregularities of American imperialism in Haiti and Costa Rica, nor did Hughes shrink from accusing the late noble lord and his government of unfair discrimination. Toward the end of 1920 Sir John Cadman, an official of the Anglo-Persian, and war-time Allied petroleum director, was sent across the Atlantic to patch up a peace. But Mr. Teagle rebuffed him at the annual meeting of the American Petroleum Institute, and the mission ended in failure.

Then there was a windfall. The Persian Government granted the Standard Oil a provisional concession to the north Persian field. This suggested the possibility of a bargain. Sir John Cadman again shipped to New York. After some negotiations the famous "50-50" bargain was arranged by the terms of which the Standard Oil accepted the Anglo-Persian as a partner to its north Persian lease while the Anglo-Persian agreed to share with the Rockefeller Company its stock in the Turkish Petroleum. This little deal put the "finis" to the diplomatic controversy and established good-will between the two oil firms.

And it is this dearly bought, much-fought-over share of the Standard Oil in the Turkish Petroleum which the Anglo-Persian's chairman quite casually, as it were, declares to have reverted to his company, the original owner. But Mr. Teagle challenges him on this point. Now how is it possible for two people to have two opinions on such a very definite thing as the ownership of a very costly block of shares in a company which may some day be worth hundreds of millions of dollars?

The clue to the mystery is the tactics of the Standard Oil of sitting on the fence as long as the future ownership of Mosul remained undecided. Though at Lausanne the Standard Oil acknowledged itself quarter-partner in the Turkish Petroleum Company, and through it agreed during the conference to allow the Anglo-Persian a 10 per cent oil royalty "in return for the halving of its original share of the 50 per cent in the Turkish Petroleum Company, Ltd., in order to admit of the American group's entry on equal terms," nevertheless it opposed and succeeded in preventing the incorporation of the Turkish Petroleum's concession into the Allied treaty with Turkey. The Standard Oil valued its share in the Turkish Petroleum, even showed its gratitude to Anglo-Persian for arranging its entry, but preferred not to take up its shares and not to make the participation too definite or to strengthen the position of the Turkish Petroleum too much. Suppose Mosul didn't go to the British after all.

For the present there is sufficient oil on the world market. And the Standard Oil, which is primarily a seller and not a producer, has an interest in limiting the quantity available for sale. But the Royal Dutch Shell and the Anglo-Persian are producers; moreover England and the empire need petroleum product. Britain desires a better fate than that of remaining dependent on the Standard for her "gas" and liquid fuel. If the British got Mosul, the Turkish Petroleum would immediately commence exploitation in the hope of striking underground reserves of commercial value. If the Standard Oil could in some way get Mosul it would clamp the lid down tight and keep the field in storage for a decade—or until it becomes impossible for the Rockefeller trust to supply its overseas custom, perhaps even its trade in America, with the oil mined in the Western Hemisphere.

In order to permit itself freedom of action, the Standard Oil allowed its participation in the Turkish Petroleum to remain so vague as to enable it to stay should staying suit its purposes, or to surrender the shares should that seem the better part of wisdom. More than that. The Standard Oil wished to eschew any alliance which would prejudice it in the eyes of the Turks. For there are indications that the Standard Oil would prefer to see Mosul under Turkish suzerainty and the Mosul concession its own. Certain it is that well-known British interests, among which is Lord Inverforth of the British Mexican Company, have been encouraging the Turks to resist Downing Street's claim to Mosul, and the "British Mex" is a subsidiary of the Standard. Observers and diplomats who were at Lausanne are convinced that the Mosul question would have been settled there to the satisfaction of the British had it not been for the secret moral support which Ismet Pasha received from the United States political and business quarters. And rumors now persist in the City to the effect that American inspiration is behind Turkish obstinacy.

The situation is not without an element of the comic even when it demonstrates the almost insuperable difficulties which arise when nations attempt to solve real Gordian knots by consent. The Lausanne conference failed to settle the Mosul problem. Two years of futile negotiations followed between Turkey and England which at times seemed to be the preliminaries to war. Then it was put up to the League. The League passed the buck to the World Court. The November decision of the Court passed it right back to Geneva. The Court ruled that the Council resolution must be unanimous and will be binding—if Turkey reads the Lausanne treaty as the Court does. But already the semi-official Angora telegraphic agency declares that the Court verdict "was pronounced under well-known influences" and "is calculated to give a bad impression of the moral value of an organization which is supposed to be an instrument of international peace." It is dollars to doughnuts therefore that the Kemal cabinet will not accept the League award.

Meanwhile rumors that the Angora Government has granted the Standard Oil a concession will not be downed even by denials from the highest authorities. It is generally known, of course, that Standard Oil agents have lately been very active in Anatolia, sometimes under the guise of Inverforth representatives. It should also be remarked that the Standard Oil is paying far more attention to the market in Asiatic Turkey than it deserves, and that it seems prepared to sacrifice many important conquests—in the matter of Soviet oil, for instance—in order to fortify itself in Anatolia even though it is patent that that poor, non-industrial country is hardly worth a small fraction of the effort the American trust is putting into it unless it be as a preparation for an extensive concession. "From the American point of view," writes a special correspondent of The Manchester Guardian Commercial, "the turnover [in Turkey] is quite negligible." It is generally deduced, therefore, that the energy of the Americans in Anatolia is actuated by a desire to be ready for any eventuality. What if there were some compromise on Mosul?

Even if the League achieves unanimity, Turkey will, without a doubt, refuse to bow to Geneva's authority. In this she will have the support of Moscow and—politics make strange bedfellows—of American and certain British oil interests. "We are informed," says the Morning Post, "that the true facts of the case are that certain American oil interests have made an arrangement with an independent English group, which has been negotiating with the Turkish Government for certain oil concessions in case Mosul should be awarded to the Turks by the League of Nations." For the present, therefore, we must await further developments, not so much in Geneva which can do little to solve the deadlock, unanimous decision or no, but from Angora and London where the British and Turkish governments and the rival oil magnates will match forces.

Little Bob Wins

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, December 18

IF anything were needed to show the caliber and character of the solemn gentlemen who lead and manage the Republican Party these days it has certainly been supplied by the handling in the Senate of the Little Bob La Follette case. The climax in that came last week when Little Bob, after having been patted, petted, and fawned on in the most sickening and hypocritical fashion both publicly and privately, handed out to the Committee on Committees as strong a note of defiance as could be prepared. In words of one syllable he said in effect that their picayune places meant nothing to him, that he was not their sort of Republican, that he stood on the platform of the Progressives, not on theirs, that he proposed to assert complete independence of action in the Senate and out, that if they persisted in tendering him these committee assignments as a Republican he wanted no misunderstanding as to where he stood. In other words, he kicked the orthodox organization machine vigorously and squarely in the midriff. And the party managers, as represented by the Committee on Committees, submitted to the kick, gulped, choked, swallowed the dose, and let the tender stand.

No wonder the Administration press, which daily dwells upon the wise, firm, and courageous leadership of the godly Calvin, and which not long ago gave columns of space to the resolute words of the intrepid textile king and White House adviser, Senator William M. Butler of Massachusetts, who after he had tried to defeat Little Bob and failed ringingly declared that he would never be recognized as a Republican—no wonder these newspapers passed hurriedly over this business of Little Bob with almost no editorial comment at all. No wonder the "Presidential Spokesman" at the correspondents' conference this week ignored questions touching on this topic. No wonder Republican Senators who had previously told the world that young La Follette would be tossed out on his ear and that they would do the tossing now bitterly say: "Oh, hades, let's forget it." Of course they want to forget it. Who wouldn't? Nothing quite as absurd has happened in Washington in a long while, and no sillier-looking set of men has been seen in the Senate than the Republican Senators to whom the buck in this business was passed. They feel pretty badly over the outcome and no one blames them. They had to take the responsibility for a decision that most of them feel should not have been put up to them and, having decided, they had to go through with it, take young Bob's insults and the caustic criticism of their colleagues besides.

They deserved what they got because of the bumble-puppy way in which they handled the situation if for nothing else, but it is true they did not get quite a fair deal. The decision properly belonged with the titular leader of the party in the White House, and to him the various Senators early went for advice and instructions. They should have known better and next time they will. However, the vigor and flatness with which the brave Butler had spoken on the subject made them certain that Mr. Coolidge would take the same noble stand.

The case against Little Bob was clean cut and quite unanswerable. He stood for everything his father stood for, had committed every party crime of which the Old Man had been guilty and for which he had been banned. His campaign had been an anti-Coolidge campaign and literally he has not a single political idea in common with an orthodox Republican. There seemed but one thing to do—throw him out as they had his father. That had been the Coolidge attitude toward the old Senator. It never occurred to them it would not be the same with the son. But they were wrong.

Instead of a calm, firm, determined Coolidge such as he is pictured by the magazine writers who are invited to dinner at the White House or go down on the Mayflower, they found an indecisive, troubled, querulous Coolidge, from whom no definite word could be got. They found the same sort of Coolidge who for five weeks during the Daugherty investigation wabbled weakly from side to side, pulled one way by Borah, Reed, and Pepper and bluffed the other way by the violence of the Attorney General, whose resignation he finally requested in a letter that gave him a clean bill of health, basing the request on a point so remote from the real issue as to be highly ridiculous.

In this case what plainly happened was that someone had pointed out to Mr. Coolidge that when the next Senate meets in 1927 the Republican majority is bound to be either greatly reduced or wiped out. Everybody concedes that the Republicans are sure to lose certain seats they now hold, and the chances are that the Republican managers will not be able to organize the Senate without La Follette's help. It was conveyed to the President that if La Follette were roughly thrown out now there was a strong possibility that the party managers would have to crawl on their hands and knees to get his help in 1927—and then not get it. He might easily be able to paralyze the Administration in that session. Furthermore, Little Bob comes up as a candidate again in 1928, not 1926. That means he runs with the next candidate for President. At that time it is easy to understand it will be desirable to have him run as a Republican candidate for the Senate, in order to insure the Wisconsin electoral vote being cast for a Republican candidate for President. There was the further fact that the political life of Senator Lenroot, who comes up as a candidate next year, hangs by a slender thread which Little Bob can break—and probably will—if he likes.

When these various aspects of the situation percolated into the White House the firmness about Little Bob, the determination to hang him by the thumbs and then boil him in oil, oozed slowly away. In its place came a great indecision. The plain fact is that from the President down they wanted to kick him out, but they were afraid. He had them buffaloed. He made a holy show of the whole shooting match.

After this exhibition it will take either cast-iron cheek or a complete lack of humor for Republican Senators this session to stand up and prate about party principles, convictions, and courage. Yet some of them will do it. Some of them qualify both ways.

In the Driftway

ALL is not well in the Highlands. The Drifter hears on the best authority—that of the chief medical officer for Inverness-shire—that the braw highlanders of the Isle of Skye are fast becoming a weak and degenerate race; and the cause is easily stated: they have abandoned their traditional diet of oatmeal for a more effeminate menu of tea, white bread, and jam. The Drifter cannot remember if it was these particular highlanders who were admiringly named Ladies from Hell by the enemy in the late war, but whether it was or not, the epithet fits admirably the opinion that most persons have of a highlander. He may bare his knees to the winter wind, he may wear funny looking tassels on his belt, he may cut his clothes of plaid in vivid colors—but look out, for he is not a man to tamper with. And the Drifter, for one, would have been perfectly willing to believe that much of his strength and firmness came from his oatmeal.

* * * * *

THERE are literally millions of men and women in the world today who reluctantly sat themselves before a plate of porridge in their youth and listened to the words: "Eat it up now, if you want to grow up to be a big, strong man—or woman." Some had to consume the unwelcome dish with plain milk and without sugar, other more fortunate ones could disguise it with sweetening and cream, but eat it they must and did. When the spoon scraped emptily along the sides of the dish then, and then only, might they reach out for more palatable and no doubt less worthy food. The Drifter has no statistics concerning the number of boys and girls who actually did grow up to be big and strong as a result of this diet, but looking about him he suspects either that the effect of the oatmeal was exaggerated by those in authority, or, like the highlanders, the young hopefuls early changed their fare to jam and tea.

* * * * *

THE latter is more than likely. In these degenerate days, when children no longer feel the rod, when schools no longer keep their pupils seated firmly and silently at desks and demand of them tasks done by rigid rote, probably oatmeal, too, has gone by the board. In its place we have for breakfast food shot from guns, food made out of a whisk-broom cut in bits, food that sticks in the teeth and makes the jaws ache with chewing—all of these doubtless highly proper for a machine age. Or, on the other hand, we have the smooth, slimy, starchy sort of breakfast food that slips down without effort of any kind. The days of real oatmeal porridge, when the stuff was full of taste and oat grains and a body and consistency of its own, have vanished. This is the sort of porridge that highlanders were made of; it took eight hours to cook it over a slow fire—no three-minute oatmeal then; and even diluted with milk or cream, it was no easy task to swallow it down. And when it was down, the eater was fortified against a rude world, innocent of steam-radiators, of elevators, of fur-lined coats. A wool reefer buttoned over a stomach full of oatmeal was the only bulwark against zero cold.

* * * * *

BUT alas, for the obstinacy of mankind. Children did not like their nice porridge; and their parents so heartily objected to the cold and the hardships of life that they set about inventing relief from them. Now we live in a warmer, easier world and scientists figure that in a few thousand years our teeth will disappear because we eat soft foods and will no longer have any use for them. The Drifter does not know for certain whether he is glad or sorry. The truth is that he does not care for oatmeal himself, and to that extent he can sympathize with the highlanders. On the other hand, nothing is so abominable in prospect to him as a perpetual diet of white bread, jam, and tea.

Anita Whitney's Conviction

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The nation-wide protest that is being made against the confirmation by the Supreme Court of the sentence of Miss Anita Whitney to the penitentiary for attending a Communist Labor Party meeting comes with startling force to the voters and taxpayers of Oakland.

The local papers continue to repeat the contention of the protestants that she has been a power for good in this community all her life; that she was for seven years secretary of the Associated Charities of Oakland, and was the first juvenile probation officer here until it became a salaried office, when it was taken over by the man who later became the district attorney—the one, by the way, under whom she was prosecuted. And they continue also the misstatements of officials concerning her. The Governor, in an open letter to Mr. Upton Sinclair denying his plea for a pardon for her, says: "Her powerful influence and wealth have kept her out of prison for nearly six years. Other violators of this law, who have lacked this influence, have been serving their terms in prison."

Now, Mr. O'Connor, her attorney, gratuitously offered his services; and others furnished bail money for her. I found her living where she had been for years, with her aged mother, brother, and sister in a modest old-fashioned apartment house. They keep one servant and have never owned a motor car. She has no "wealth." And if she had "influence," how could she have come into the toils of the law for an offense which in the case of 95 per cent of those present was not held an offense? They indicted her on five counts. All she was found guilty of was the first count, which she admitted: of attending that meeting—of which the record shows that, being a pacifist, she offered a resolution directing their efforts toward legal methods rather than "massed-action." But the Governor, who refuses her a pardon, does not know after five years even the truth about her personal circumstances, which anyone who chooses to call upon her could ascertain for him. At the time of her arrest all her small liquid assets were surrendered in bail for unfortunate offenders whose wives and children she had known and helped—many whose families came to her in frantic distress, without bread in the house, pleading for her help. She gave, for the breadwinner's return. "What could I do?" she asked pitifully, in explaining this matter to me, which has been held against her as part of her lawless interference with justice!

Of the six who were arrested, neither she nor any other of the 145 who attended that meeting was arrested at the time. But two weeks later, when she was about to address a civic-center meeting on "The Negro Problem in the United States," her accuser at her trial, Fenton Thompson of the Loyalty Squad, interfered, demanding that she should not speak. She had been first president of the State Civic Center and had helped to organize the Oakland branch. They closed doors and voted then and there, and by 110 to 43 indorsed her. After this meeting Police Inspector Fenton Thompson arrested her.

Ten thousand dollars bail was demanded. It was he who at a Communist meeting a fortnight before had "planted" a maroon piano cover in a bookcase in a remote corner, inside of whose glass doors was a small silk American flag—this was the reluctant testimony of a prosecution witness at the trial.

But at the trial the maroon woolen cloth became a Communist red flag, flaunted with terrorism over the flag of our country. The "plant" of this piano cover was brought out by her attorney in court on the last day he was able to speak there; for he was denied by the presiding judge a continuance which he had asked on account of the deadly illness of his two-year-old child. Her attorney would not ask for his own personal need, which was apparent to all by his flaming cheeks and shining eyes, for he also was suffering like his child from the "flu," and he died forty-eight hours later! That same week one of the jurors died of the "flu," but a thirteenth had been provided—and the judge, in the midst of these funerals, allowed her one day to find a new attorney! She found no more such generosity or keen interest.

Women's Capacity for Work

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention has been called to an article, Jobs for Women, in The Nation under date of December 9, 1925, by Ruby A. Black.

A paragraph in this article quotes a representative of the Women's Bureau in a newspaper interview. This representative of the Women's Bureau is myself and the alleged newspaper interview was a feature story written by a newspaper woman by the name of Hazel Blair and circulated by Charles W. Duke, Sunday Magazine editor of the Philadelphia Public Ledger two years ago. I had extended correspondence with Mr. Duke at that time advising him that I had given no such interview.

What I want to make clear is that neither I nor any member of the Women's Bureau has ever given an interview taking the position that "Thousands of young women break down every year" and that "Women are more able to stand the clamor and dust and fumes of the factory than the speed and responsibility and tension of office work. Women can stand any kind of work better than professional work, such as law, journalism, and medicine."

We have no information to bear out such a statement and have never made it anywhere.

Anthracite Country—Another View

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Anne Hard's articles on the Anthracite Country are fine pieces of writing. They are true as regards the show of wealth in Scranton, Wilkes-Barre, and Hazleton. Their picture, too, of the quiet courage and self-denial of the miners, their wives and families is close to the facts. Nevertheless, the impression left upon the mind of the reader is false. I read those articles in New York; and settled back in my chair with the comfortable thought: "Well, here for once is a strike without suffering. For once we shall not have to look up our old clothes and send them to the strikers."

This morning I arrived at Plymouth—just outside of Wilkes-Barre. I wish Mrs. Hard could have been with me during these past twelve hours. During this past week two children fell fainting in the Plymouth schools. They were starved. One boy ate rotten apples thrown out by a grocer. Another boy confessed to a baker that he had not eaten for twenty-four hours. In that one town are many, many children without underwear or substantial clothing of any sort. It must give them a lively satisfaction to look at the fur coats which roused Mrs. Hard's admiration.

These miners have nerve and pride. They are not squealing. A good deal of bravado, moreover, is a necessary part of their campaign strategy. But it doesn't fill stomachs or keep out the cold.

Anyone who wants to help can send food or clothes to Mrs. Jacob Waring, president of the Women's Civic Club of Plymouth, Pennsylvania.

A Red-Blooded Vegetarian

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: So you too are a victim of the popular superstition that a vegetarian is a thin, shrinking coward and a meat-eater a sleek, attractive hero! How perfectly simple! But is this in harmony with the general progressive trend of The Nation?

And are you aware that you need only publish a few more grossly unjust articles like Ernest Sutherland Bates's The Vegetarian and the Tiger [November 25] to make mortal enemies of all your vegetarian subscribers? Or do you think them so negligible that you can safely ignore them?

That Alleged Italo-Russian Treaty

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I note in your issue of November 18 a paragraph on the so-called Italo-Russian treaty. You have probably seen the denials of the Moscow and Rome governments and of the London Soviet embassy. I happen to know that the relations between Russia and Turkey are very cordial and that an understanding with Italy by which Turkey would suffer is altogether out of the question. Friendship with Turkey is as fundamental to Soviet foreign policy as friendship with China.

The Turkish ambassador was the only ambassador at the station here when Rakovsky left for Paris, and the Turkish ambassador in Moscow is very much persona grata in the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs. Turkey is the biggest Moslem Power—barring Anglo-Saxon Britain—moreover she controls the Straits. The Russians want to be good to her. True, after Lausanne, where the Turks let down the Russians, there was a period of lukewarmness, but that is all over now. The rumor about the treaty can be explained in several ways. The relations between Russia and Italy are cordial. Italy has ambitions in the East, in Asia Minor, in Syria. It would be comforting to Italy to have Russian aid in these designs.

What Solomon Said

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of December 9 Mr. Upton Sinclair rebukes you for attributing "Spare the rod and spoil the child" to Solomon. He writes: "Hudibras said it. What Solomon said was: 'He that spareth the rod hateth his child.'"

The passage presumably referred to is in Proverbs, ch. 13, v. 24. The Authorized Version (King James version), the Revised Version, and the American Revised Version all give it in the following words: "He that spareth his rod hateth his son."

The Meeting

By JAMES CHICHESTER

I saw them meet upon the hill,
Circe and the fair Persephone;
The day was hushed and strangely still—
The maid came led by Mercury.

The meeting on that teeming mound
Set signals for all things to rise;
Green growths came springing from the ground
And rain fell softly from the skies.

First Glance

"MAY DAYS: An Anthology of Verse from Masses-Liberator," edited by Genevieve Taggard (Boni and Liveright: $3), possesses a merit which is so rare in anthologies of contemporary verse that it deserves to be cried out. "May Days" is interesting. Numberless other collections of modern poems are more or less valuable for reference, and some of them are indispensable. But they are not continuously readable, and the reason is, I fancy, that the contents are catholically chosen for their excellence alone. Now it happens that we differ in nothing today so much as in our notions as to what constitutes excellence and importance in poetry; so that a "representative" volume of the "best" poems will of necessity be a hodge-podge both of ideas and of styles, and one may be sure that the future, having its own conviction as to what was important in our time, will find most of the going in these anthologies very hard. I have always believed that an anthology should be one-sided, that it should reflect only the prejudices of the editor or the tendencies of his school. It will then be interesting to certain readers at any rate; and if in the long run it prove all wrong, surely that will be the next best thing to having proved all right. I neither know nor care what the future will think of "May Days," but I am positive that it will be in no doubt as to the character of the book. For it has a character. All of the poems in it are the product of a point of view.

Just what that point of view was Miss Taggard has had some difficulty in saying in her introduction. And no wonder, since it shifted with events and with the coming and going of personalities. It is with the shifts that Miss Taggard has had the most trouble—and again no wonder, considering that the period of which she writes the intellectual history in fifteen pages included not only "a war and a revolution and five or six famines" but a most engaging holiday—a May Day of free speech just on the eve of the war and the revolution referred to. Yet in the main Miss Taggard has brilliantly succeeded in suggesting the spirit which moved the poets and cartoonists of the Masses and the Liberator in those most exciting days of American journalism. "What survived," writes Floyd Dell, "was a collection of pictures, articles, stories, poems, and plays so gay and bold, so new and vivid and forceful, that the magazine [the Masses] became a sort of rallying-place for young genius from all over the country." Here are the best of the poems.

"Although much fine poetry was published in the Masses-Liberator," says Miss Taggard, "I have not tried to restrict this anthology to verse of conspicuous poetic merit. Much of the best is light verse. I have tried to preserve everything that gave the flavor of those days." Wherein, of course, she was exactly right. There are many pieces of conspicuous merit—by John Reed, Max Eastman, E. E. Cummings, C. E. S. Wood, James Rorty, Carl Sandburg, Louis Untermeyer, Hazel Hall, Louise Bogan, Genevieve Taggard, Vachel Lindsay, and Amy Lowell. But light verse and propaganda verse predominate, and they are what give body to the book. And the final distinction is given it by several longer poems toward the end which, although they were called forth by particular events, still breathe with passion and anger and pity. These are Third Degree and The Strange Funeral in Braddock, by Michael Gold, and Tom Mooney and The Heretics, by William Ellery Leonard.

The Latest Negro

The New Negro. Edited by Alain Locke. Albert and Charles Boni. $5.

THIS book marks an epoch in the hectic career of the American Negro. It illuminates an intellectual revolution which owes its origin and expression to a multiplying series of social changes during the past decade. In undermining and annihilating the Negro myth it functions as a clarifying and signal contribution to contemporary thought.

What is the new Negro? The old Negro, according to the common conception, was an indolent, docile creation without the spirit of resistance or the desire for independence. Like most common conceptions, this one is wildly erroneous. Before the American Revolution alone, for instance, over twenty-five rebellions of black slaves occurred. After the revolution the rebellions multiplied. The struggle in Haiti under the courageous leadership of Toussaint L'Ouverture, the aid rendered Bolivar in his vivid victories in South and Central America, the reaction of the Negro in the past war all parade in formidable contradiction to the conception. These insurrections, however, were evidences of primitive recalcitrancy and aggressiveness rather than of a provocative and intelligent rebelliousness. They were the frantic, futile struggles of a suppressed race. The new Negro represents a different reaction. He is rebellious likewise, but his passions have become subtilized, his primitivism refined. He has discovered a new weapon—the pen. A new culture is in the process of evolution. And the present volume is an expression of that culture. The great diversity among the topics it treats is a sound indication of the versatility of the Negro genius. Here is represented the effervescence of a new spirit in an ancient people.

The cultural growth of the Negro since the Civil War went through two evolutions before it reached its present culmination in the philosophy of the new Negro. The first stage was characterized by a passionate imitation of the culture of the white race. White mores, white conceptions, white ideals became for the Negro the source of both inspiration and aspiration. Negro leaders fell in line with this servile, goose-step procession. The second stage revealed a revolution in attitude. This period was marked by the literature of protest. Imitation was transformed into antagonism. Things white were denounced and things black were eulogized. In Negro fiction, for example, the heroes were black and the villains white. It was a period of melodramatic sentimentality. This stage reached its apex of extravagance and fanaticism in the Garvey movement with its "back to Africa" slogan, its Black Star Line steamship company, its black god, black madonna, and black Jesus. The third and latest stage is without the servility of the first or the exaggeration of the second. Now the aim is for firmer form and stricter substance, and there has already been attained an objectivity of description and exposition which is novel in Negro art. In the fiction of the new Negro the good characters are no longer always Negroes or the bad characters always whites; they vary with the shift of episode, the science of situation. The imitation and hostility of the first two periods have been swallowed up by the growing objectivity of the third. In Negro sociology the same vicissitudes of thought and sentiment are to be detected. Armstrong and Booker T. Washington, the founders of the schools at Hampton and Tuskegee, with their emphasis upon adaptation, their advocacy of industrial education, their denunciation of resistance, represented the first stage; Burghardt DuBois and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, with their defiant declaration of human rights and their sentimental exaltation of all things black, represented the second stage; while Charles Johnson (editor of Opportunity), Alain Locke, and Abram L. Harris, Jr., with their plea for an objective approach to the entire race problem and an equally impartial study of things Negro and white, represent the third stage.

Slavery had bred despair and a yearning for the bright vistas of another world. Without happiness or hope, it had turned the Negro from the real to the ethereal, from the earthly to the Elysian. This other-worldly religiosity, while productive of the exquisite music of the "spirituals," has handicapped the Negro in his progress in this world; and it has infused Negro art and philosophy with a sentimentality from which it rarely has been able to escape. It lingers yet, a vestige that scarcely has begun to wither. The fiction contained in the present volume, for instance, suffers chiefly from the defects of this sentimentality, this inability to create art without melodrama, beauty without crudity. Fisher, Matheus, Hurston, and Nugent, all earnest and sincere craftsmen, are still fettered by amateurish techniques and by styles that stumble instead of flow. The work of Eric Walrond is more advanced. Although superficial in substance, his story is redeemed by diction that glitters if not glows and by a spirit that is fresh if not spontaneous. Jean Toomer, however, is the general of the group. His work transcends in significance and beauty everything that has been produced in Negro fiction. He is the Lafcadio Hearn of Negro literature. In a style as subtle as a dream he has beautified the trivial and ensnared the elusive. And Countee Cullen has well-nigh achieved in poetry what Toomer has achieved in prose. McKay in places is brilliant, and Hughes is often persuasive, but Cullen is in a class of Negro poets by himself. Among the essays those of Charles S. Johnson, M. J. Herskovits, Walter White, and E. Franklin Frazier are most significant.

In the next fifteen years a still newer Negro will be evolved. That Negro, in a still newer book, will leave an even greater record of the increasing genius of his race.

W. E. Woodward

Bread and Circuses. By W. E. Woodward. Harper and Brothers. $2.

MR. WOODWARD is one of those who, having discovered that the world is all wrong, are in the best of all possible positions for enjoying it thoroughly. Both the ancient task of justifying the ways of God to man and that more characteristically modern one of justifying the ways of man to God are sufficiently difficult to disturb the equanimity and ruin the temper of anyone intelligent enough to comprehend the problem, but there is much to be enjoyed by those who can wash their hands of all responsibility for either eternal justice or the goodness of the human heart. Mr. Woodward's opinion of the qualities which make for success is sufficiently indicated by the title of a book—"The Importance of Being Second Rate"—said to have been written by the hero of the present work, and his opinion of the human species is much like that recommended by the Abbé Coignard when he pointed out the tendency of idealists to hate that chief portion of mankind which does not come up to their ideals; but the result of this disillusion is a great capacity for enjoying the spectacle of life. Thanks to it no good story ever turns bitter in the mouth because, after the way of good stories, its poetic justice is not quite perfect; and no personality ceases to be engaging because its limitations are apparent. There are, it may be remarked, three sorts of serenity to which men may attain. There is the serenity of those who rest in a muddled faith in a "somehow good" and there is the serenity of those from hope and fear set free; but there is a third kind, simple enough to name but oddly difficult of attainment for those born with brains and understanding, which may best be described as a realization that one did not make the world and is not responsible for its defects. Those who achieve the first generally become liberal clergymen; those who achieve the second have generally little to say; but the third is the philosophy of the perfect raconteur, and Mr. Woodward is certainly the best of contemporary raconteurs.

He has looked "business," the central fact of American life, through and through, and he understands thoroughly that combination of luck and greed which goes to the making of the most admired careers. He knows moreover that nothing short of a complete inversion of contemporary standards of value and a complete reorganization of contemporary society can possibly introduce sanity into a mad world; but experience and meditation first transformed the reformer he might have been into a satirist and then, not content with that, softened the satirist into a genial and philosophical commentator. Perhaps because he himself did not realize how complete this process had become his last book, "Lottery," was cast into the form of a satire; but "Bread and Circuses" frankly abandons even the pretense of bitterness and becomes merely the observations of a man who has gradually developed an absorbed but wholy disinterested concern with the strange variety of his fellow-creatures.

The scene is a Connecticut farm resort frequented chiefly by the definitely or the vaguely literary; the structure is as loose as that employed by Peacock or Huxley or Norman Douglas and the effect is indeed that of a "Chrome Yellow" or a "South Wind" completely American in tone as well as in locale, for there is about it as about these others that touch of extravagance and caricature which is less deliberate distortion than the natural result of the realization that only familiarity keeps us from perceiving that the ordinary is essentially as fantastic as any invention can be. Mr. Woodward, like one of his characters, has been reading "Mole's History of Human Wrong in the abridged edition in eighteen volumes with which most people are familiar, but the extended work in forty-two volumes, which contains the colored plates and the [illegible]ndices"; so that his story, for example, of the Lollipop King who owed his millions to the fact that while a street-car conductor he had been impressed by the universal stickiness of children, had searched out the cause of this condition, and had, by the invention of the confection which made him famous, succeeded in ameliorating this condition, maintained an inward if not outward fidelity to the history of American fortunes. As for "The Importance of Being Second Rate," it is, so he points out, "luminous with optimism," since, though it admits that the world has always been bitter and cruel to talented and sensitive people, it indicates how easy is the practical solution which consists in adapting oneself to the world.

"Almost anyone can be second rate. You do not need even a college education."

"Bread and Circuses" is, I think, the best of Mr. Woodward's books because in it he has achieved a thoroughly personal form which gives him ample opportunity for using the inexhaustible store of anecdotes with which his mind seems to be stored and yet supplies a unifying thread. Thanks to it also he can interject those comments which add so greatly to the richness of the book by indicating the substratum of genuine wisdom upon which his fantasy rests. Mr. Woodward is not a young man and he came late to writing, but he came like one who discovers after many wanderings the region for which he was really born. For years he had lived the active life of his time and been completely immersed in it. Now that time falls into the proper perspective, and so his humor lacks the shrill provinciality of some of our most successful American satirists because he sees his material as the artist must—not in time alone but, as he manages subtly to suggest, in eternity also.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Unemployment

Can Business Prevent Unemployment? By Sam A. Lewisohn, Ernest G. Draper, John R. Commons, and Don D. Lescohier. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

The Regularization of Employment: A Study in the Prevention of Unemployment. By Herman Feldman. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

ASSURANCE of regular employment as a cure for unemployment occupies the central and pivotal place in these two books. Each poses the question asked in the title of the first one: "Can business prevent unemployment?" Each answers: "Yes, to a considerable degree." None of the writers is sanguine enough to say that business enterprises can so completely control the regularity of their operations as to eliminate all unemployment. They agree that such unemployment as cannot be prevented thus will have to be in part prevented by the provision of employment on public works, or by the facilitating mechanism of public employment exchanges and in part merely made more endurable by unemployment insurance.

The first volume is the result of collaboration between two business men and two professors of economics. It summarizes the achievements of the newer strategy as they are illustrated by the experiences of a few selected establishments, and lists the names of more than one hundred concerns "which have worked successfully along stabilizing lines." Separate chapters are given to unemployment insurance and to public policies for the relief of unemployment. Other chapters are, in effect, summaries of Professor Feldman's detailed and systematic treatise.

Mr. Feldman squeezes social and governmental remedies into a relatively small section at the back of his book. In this section he makes a careful appraisal of labor-market coordination and of unemployment insurance. The bulk of his volume —some 250 closely printed pages—is devoted to a [illegible] carefully elaborated explanation and criticism of remedies attempted by individual establishments and industries. He deals with the control of demand through research, diversification of output, style simplification, the shaping of purchasing habits, scientific sales planning, systematic labor control, training and transfer within the plant. There is copious citation of individual establishment experience, with careful appraisal of the results.

These results are impressive. The contents of the two books show how much water has slipped over the dam since 1914. Scores—probably hundreds—of concerns are attacking this most serious of all labor problems in ways which then either were undreamed of or were believed to be of quite secondary importance. And yet one wonders. Do not these writers exaggerate the competence of business to handle the problem of unemployment? Unquestionably it can accomplish a very great deal. But "business" is not a self-contained, well-integrated force; it is a jarring complex of hundreds of thousands of individual enterprises, individual wills, working at competitive or monopolistic cross-purposes. Single units by the hundreds, perhaps by the thousands, may be able successfully to achieve (by the methods outlined in these volumes) so complete an internal balance and elimination of intra-establishment frictions that employment will be greatly steadied. But friction between sovereign establishments is a more serious problem—a problem which involves, in the reviewer's opinion, long-distance forward-planning by an authority which is above the battle.

It is true that both treatises give some space to public or governmental programs of prevention and relief. Some emphasis is laid on public-employment exchanges as well as on unemployment insurance and on research and fact-finding. These programs have merit. They do not seem likely, however, to be effective in eliminating any large proportion of the unemployment which will persist after the business concerns have accomplished their large part. Whether or not the government should be in business more, it should certainly be concerned with it more; concerned to limit its "rights," alter its rules of procedure, when those rights and rules run athwart the welfare of the community. For example, the width of the margins and extent of the fluctuations in profits may have a bearing upon regularity of employment. If so, the state might well consider using an excess-profits tax to limit the profit margin and so, perhaps, make it easier for business enterprises to resist the temptation to sacrifice labor stability to anticipated extraordinary profits.

Despite these somewhat irrelevant misgivings, the reviewer expects the two books to be widely useful; the first by inspiring business men with confidence in the idea, the second by showing them by precept and example just how to give it a measure of reality.

PAUL F. BRISSENDEN

Let It Be Allowed

Color. By Countee Cullen. Harper and Brothers. $2.

THESE lyrics by the youngest of the Negro poets—Countee Cullen is just past his majority—are likely to be considered less as the work of a gifted individual than as the utterance of a gifted, and enslaved, people. And indeed Mr. Cullen's poems are intensely race-conscious. He writes out of the pain of inflamed memories, and with a wilful harking back to the primitive heritage of his own folk. The peculiar flavor which the book gets from the fact that it was written by a colored man is to be had most sharply in the first section, from which the volume takes its title. This tang is the essence of such pieces as Atlantic City Waiter, Fruit of the Flower, and Heritage, with their insistence on the savage past; it is the essence, too, of the lovely Song of Praise, and of that shrewd lyric To My Fairer Brethren:

Insufficient that I match you
Every coin you flip;
Your demand is that I catch you
Squarely on the hip.

[illegible]

Rakishly and proud,
I have bought my right to it;
Let it be allowed.

Again and again Mr. Cullen strikes the harsh note which carries the scorn of the oppressed, the arrogance of the insulted and injured. He is engaged by the somber power and terrible brilliance of Africa as a Jew might be engaged by the purple days of Solomon's glory, or as the Gael is moved by the bright bloody history of his island. The poem by which Mr. Cullen is perhaps best known, The Shroud of Color, could have been written only by a Negro. It is a piece which, in spite of its sad lack of concision and its many cliches, yet abounds in true spiritual vigor.

But though one may recognize that certain of Mr. Cullen's verses owe their being to the fact that he shares the tragedy of his people, it must be owned that the real virtue of his work lies in his personal response to an experience which, however conditioned by his race, is not so much racial as profoundly human. The color of his mind is more important than the color of his skin. The faint acridness that gives an edge to many of these lyrics is a quality which one finds in Housman, or even in the minor strains of Herrick and of Horace. There is, for example, the song To a Brown Girl; and the same pungency is felt in the companion piece, To a Brown Boy, or in Wisdom Cometh with the Years. The twenty-eight rhymed Epitaphs have, almost without exception, a pure Gallic salt, as witness the one For a Lovely Lady:

> And sad-eyed as a doe
> Lies here (but take my word for it,
> And do not pry below).

And even in what might be called his African poems it is Mr. Cullen's endowment of music and imagery and emotional awareness that matters, over and above the presence of jungle shapes and shadows.

These excellences—fantasy, lyricism, and fine sensitiveness—the book undoubtedly has. It has also faults, the faults of youth. The poet does not shrink from such rubber-stamp phrases as "costly fee," "crimson vintage," "ensanguined mead," "coral lips." He clutches at stars and clings to dreams like any neophyte, and lives in the pleasant reassurance that after death he will return to talk to his love "in liquid words of rain." But there seems little doubt that he will shed these puerilities before his youth is over, that he will discipline and develop his unquestionable gift.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Mosul

Mosul and Its Minorities. By Harry Charles Luke. London: Martin Hopkinson and Company, Ltd. 10/6.

MOSUL to the reader of the American press has come to mean little more than a vast oil-puddle concerning the disposition of which there have been some undignified correspondence between the British and American governments and, more recently, a public brawl between Downing Street and Angora. The student knows Mosul (the modern successor to ancient Nineveh) as a Mesopotamian city which boasted political and economic importance centuries before petroleum became one of the stakes of diplomacy. By reason of its strategic location at one of the military and commercial crossroads of the Near East, Mosul has attracted to itself a curious hodge-podge of nationalities, races, and religious sects which defy adequate classification and description. If the human problems of Mosul have been overlooked by diplomatists they are not thereby deprived of their inherent interest, as will be testified by any reader of Mr. Luke's attractive book. As sometime assistant governor of Jerusalem Mr. Luke seems to have caught the spirit of the Near East; in any case he has breathed the air of Palestine, Syria, Transjordania, and Iraq and has not been stifled. What is more, he likes Mosul and has a fine curiosity concerning its history, its life, and its peoples. Kurds, Arabs, Turks, Armenians, Assyro-Chaldeans, Jews, Devil-Worshipers, and others are full of human interest to him. His book, "written in the scanty leisure of a busy official life, is to help to make these singularly interesting peoples better known to English readers, and to win for them, if possible, some additional measure of sympathy in the difficult times through which they are passing." A laudable purpose is this, especially in a world surcharged with mandates, oil concessions, atrocities reports, air raids, armed insurrections, and the like. The book is enlivened by illustrations pleasant and unpleasant—in the latter category a photograph of a public hanging in Mosul leaves nothing to the imagination.

EDWARD MEAD EARLE

Kunala. By Arpad Ferenczy. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Women are depraved, deadly, insatiate, double-tongued like serpents, and treacherous like pits covered with leaves and twigs. This is the theme running through sixteen stories told by the Kunala bird, devoted to merry adventure and quick—with good Buddhist morality—to see the temptress always.

Man of Strife. By Grove Wilson. Frank Maurice, Inc. $2.

Turmoil and contention in a man's blood war with his heart's longing for beauty and peace. Bruce Barton plunges bitterly through experiences in love, flounders to no purpose in his career as journalist, and fights the world to wrest a fragment of grace from it. A disjointed story, with much action and little significance, yet touching in sudden moments an emotional reality which elevates it all too briefly.

East of Eden. By Lynn Montross. Harper and Brothers. $2.

A novel of the cornfields, of the anxious change and uncertainty that hang over the mid-American farmlands. A balance is well kept between the intense longing of youth to leave the enslaving soil and the heavier, more tragic struggle of the older farmer to organize an agrarian association.

Highland Annals. By Olive Tilford Dargan. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

Superstitions still guide the conduct of the Southern mountain folk of whom Mrs. Dargan writes. Her affection for these people never melts to sentimentality; neither does it freeze into the objectivity of a sociological study. She sees the ruggedness of their lives, and how nevertheless they lack the stamina to combat the sense of fatality which keeps them as they always have been; but she aureoles what pathos she finds, what unconscious grandeur, with her own enthusiasm and understanding.

Married Life. By Edith O'Shaughnessy. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Mrs. O'Shaughnessy has a disturbing power, a sure and pointed and tender vision for the irreparable flaws in life. Here are six short stories dealing with phases of modern marriage, and each is appealing and absorbingly interesting. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy is always explicit and resilient; and her penetration into human tangles is luminous.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

The Russians Triumph

THE stunning performance of "Lysistrata" given by the members of the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio for the first week of their engagement at Jolson's Theater indicates that their visit may well constitute the chief artistic event of the season. At least to those unfamiliar with their language their version of Aristophanes's comedy must remain merely the scenario for a pantomine, and in it they employ music to a much less extent than is usual with them; yet so continuously beautiful and exciting is the spectacle they offer that it may without exaggeration be said that no such perfect union of the appeals which the theater can make to the eye and to the ear has been seen before on our stage, and that the sensuous warmth of their art makes anything of similar sort which we can offer seem painfully chilly by comparison.

We can wonder at and we might dream of imitating the synthesis of rhythm and color which they achieve, but the temperament of their actors is something which is and probably must remain neither imitable nor wholly comprehensible —the product of a race accustomed to an emotional exuberance foreign to our natures and of a tradition of expression through sensuous means unfamiliar to us and to those other people who, like us, know only words as a means of expression. For years the Russians have been accustomed to sing or to dance the things which other peoples have said. They have translated their poems into the sensuous language of melody; they have danced their stories; they have seemed sometimes to be able to state even their criticism of life in a rhythmic gesture; and as a result their bodies are alive and eloquent. Words we can use, especially if instead of uttering them we can put them upon paper, and thus we open our souls to one another in books passed silently from hand to hand; but acting is as strange and artificial to us as it is natural to the Russians. It is with difficulty that we teach even the expressions of our face to speak, and at the best our bodies are dumb. These Russians, on the contrary, are eloquent even to the tips of their toes. They defy with the crooking of an elbow, they implore with one outstretched hand, and when they mock they are mockery personified. And yet—most marvelous of all—these fiery temperaments and these eloquent bodies are disciplined to a perfect sense of style; though they speak so copiously and so vehemently, nothing ever disturbs the harmony of the whole since all their variety is included in one continuous rhythm, much as in the greatest poetry the most divers and the most discordant passions find somehow complete expression within the limits set by the regular beat of verse.

We cannot, I suppose, have everything, and if I were compelled to choose between this magnificently sensuous art and that art of words which is the only one ever really mastered by those who made the tradition to which I belong, I have no doubt that I should choose the second and the colder —partly, perhaps, because it is the only one which I can thoroughly understand. And yet the very least that can be said of this company from Moscow is that it brings to us the perfection of an art whose beauty could not have been guessed before it was seen.

"Merchants of Glory" (Guild Theater) is a French play written with a very definite purpose—to ridicule and excoriate those who trade upon the fame won by others in the war and who march to political victory under banners inscribed with vaguely patriotic sentiments and "the names of our glorious dead"—and yet it escapes in a considerable measure the usual futility of the propaganda play by the subtle persuasiveness of its argument and, more especially, by the insight which it reveals into that unconscious hypocrisy which betrays those who do not know until too late how utterly they have been betrayed. Had it chosen as its central character the eternal opportunist, the profiteer who does appear in a subordinate position, it could hardly have avoided the obvious; but it has chosen instead the simple-minded father of a supposed hero and it has traced with remarkable insight the stages by which he comes gradually to exploit for his own ends what was in the beginning a genuine and overwhelming sorrow.

With the very considerable effectiveness of the play as propaganda I have no immediate concern. It exhibits, moreover, one of the defects almost inevitable in the play with a purpose, for its characters, though skilfully drawn, are slightly abstract after the manner of all characters created in order to fit a previously conceived intellectual scheme. Yet it seems to me to rise to the level of intellectual and dramatic importance because of the insight which it reveals into that capacity of the human mind to deceive itself which we are only beginning to understand. The authors have remembered what those who attack an illusion generally forget; they have remembered that those who cherish the illusion cherish it not because of any meaninglessly obstinate blindness but because the illusion performs a function in their lives and often because, as in the case of the father in the present play, it enables them to escape from a reality too terrible to be borne.

The authors again have realized that the hypocritical statesmen who live upon the legend that to die mutilated in the mud of a battlefield is dulce et decorum could not keep the lie alive were it not that there are thousands who have a need to believe it and, propagandists though they are, they have realized that the problem which they discuss offers no solution so simple as that of brushing aside a few profiteers and a few demagogues. The true villain of the piece is not the opportunist nor the profiteer but that insidious cunning of the human mind which can invent a delusion to save itself and then fall victim to its own device. In the production which the Theater Guild has given the play the excellent work of Augustin Duncan as the father and of Jose Ruben as the son makes them stand out in a cast of unequal merit.

Eugene O'Neill's romantic play "The Fountain" (Greenwich Village Theater) has moments of great beauty and yet it is somewhat disappointing, chiefly, perhaps, because it reveals little of the characteristic flavor of its author and is obviously a blind alley so far as the development of his genius is concerned.

India's New Intransigence

By W. NORMAN BROWN

THE spectacular days of Gandhi and non-cooperation in India have passed and the surface of Indian politics is now less troubled than for eight years; nevertheless the intensity of Indian political sentiment is greater than ever before and the activity of the Nationalists more effective. Before the appointment of the Montagu-Chelmsford Commission on Indian Constitutional Reform the anti-British, or home rule, feeling expressed itself chiefly in direct seditious action and utterance. When the new constitution was defined and made operative, the disappointment of the Nationalists broke out in further sedition that culminated in the serious disorders accompanying non-cooperation. But during the past three years the Nationalists, taking advantage of the weapons provided by the new constitution, have brought legislative, rather than seditious, pressure to bear upon the Government of India. Their aims are the same, the spirit is not diminished, but the greater certainty of success has produced action that is less frantic.

The credit for the change of tactics belongs almost entirely to the Swaraj Party and its founder, the late Mr. C. R. Das. A man of much political ability, he had first opposed Gandhi's non-cooperation, then later accepted it; but in December, 1922, feeling that the movement was not proving successful, he had advocated a modified non-cooperation. He failed to carry with him the All-India National Congress, of which he was president at the time, and he broke away, forming a new party, now known as the Swaraj Party. This is at present the dominant party in India; it is back again in the All-India Congress, having returned by invitation last Christmas on its own terms, and last July it received the final surrender of Gandhi, who declared it his accredited agent.

Das's attitude was practical, expedient, that of a competent political strategist, lying midway between complete boycott of the "Satanic" British rulership urged by the Mahatma and the whole-hearted cooperation so earnestly besought by the Government for the new constitution. Although, like Gandhi, he hated the new scheme with its principle of "dyarchy," he perceived the weakness of the scheme in "reserving" some subjects to the administration for legislation and "transferring" others to the legislative bodies for action, which action, however, in most cases the Government could override through its powers of "certification" of defeated measures. Gandhi's method was complete refusal to employ the legislative bodies established under the constitution, to contest no elections, and at the same time to boycott the courts. Das, on the other hand, urged the Nationalists to elect representatives to the national and provincial legislative bodies. These representatives would form an opposition to the hand-made Government party, which is composed not of elected members but of certain administrative officials who are in the legislative bodies ex officio and a number of members who are "nominated," that is, appointed, by the Government. The Nationalist representatives should make their demands in the legislatures. If these demands should be granted, well enough; but if they should be refused by the Government—and it was a foregone conclusion that they would be—then the Nationalists should adopt a settled policy of opposing all measures supported by the Government. If they should prove able to defeat the Government party then a situation would arise in which a "responsible" Government, as in England, would resign, and a new ministry be formed with the confidence of the dominant party. In India, where the Government is not "responsible," there would be no such easy success, but the Government would be in the unenviable position of having to use its powers of certification to enact legislation that had been repudiated by the people's elected representatives.

This plan of entry into the Legislative Councils has been successful. Although the Swaraj Party itself has never had a majority in any national or provincial legislative body, it has been able with the frequent help of other Nationalists to defeat the Government in Bengal, Bihar, and the Central Provinces, to compel the withdrawal there of certain "transferred" subjects of legislation, to deny salaries to the ministers, who are appointed by the governors—in short, to give verisimilitude to the claim that the dyarchy has been destroyed and the bureaucracy revived.

In national affairs they have not had this success, for there legislation lies in the hands not of one body but of two, the National Legislative Assembly and a second chamber, known as the Council of State. This second chamber has a larger proportional government element than the lower house, while its elected members are chosen by a much more limited electorate. Hence, while the Swarajists, with their allies, have succeeded in defeating the Government in the Assembly, their action has invariably been rescinded by the Council of State.

The deadlock thus created seemed unalterable until the Swarajists about six months back showed the first signs of abating their intransigence. The initial gesture was made by Mr. Das on May 2, in his presidential address at the opening on the Bengal Provincial Conference. He repeated the demand for dominion status—"not servitude but free alliance by consent"—censured the Government of India for the Amritsar tragedy and the Bengal "ordinance" of last winter that authorized the administration to arrest, hold, try, and condemn without resort to the usual processes of law, but at the same time made the significant pronouncement that "provided some real responsibility is transferred to the people, there is no reason why we should not cooperate with the Government." These opinions were embodied in a resolution and adopted by the conference. Shortly afterward Gandhi gave his approval, and a little later Mr. Jinnah, leader of the other important Indian party, the Independents, announced himself in accord with the Swarajists.

The good faith of the Swarajist gesture has been further made evident by two specific instances of cooperation. The first of these was the acceptance by Mr. Nehru, successor to Mr. Das as All-India head of the party, of a seat on a government-appointed committee to recommend means of increasing the Indian element in the army. The second came at the opening of the session of the National Legislative Assembly, August 21, when the chair of president fell vacant and for the first time was thrown open to election. Mr. Patel, the leading Swarajist of western India, ran for the office, was elected, and has since gen-inely cooperated with the Government by subordinating arty loyalty to the demand of his position for impartiality nd has thereby won the commendation of the Government nd the Nationalists alike.

Meanwhile, Lord Birkenhead, Secretary of State for ndia, had in July made his long-awaited speech before he House of Lords, which he had prepared only after consultation with the Viceroy, Lord Reading, who had been alled home from India especially for that purpose. The ieart of his remarks was that there would be no serious change in the Indian constitution before 1929, the date riginally set for revision, but meanwhile the Government would welcome signs of unity among the Indians and would consider extension of representative government along ines that might be agreed upon by all parties.

The signs of unity were not long coming. When the National Legislative Assembly met in August the Swarajists and the Independents succeeded in constructing a common program and at the proper time presented it. The occasion was the report of the Muddiman Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform. This committee had been appointed long ago by the Government, and Lord Birkenhead had stated that the very moderate recommendations of the majority report would be executed. When the report was presented to the Assembly, Lord Reading asked that the majority report be accepted and recommended. But the Nationalists, completely united, by a vote of 72 to 45 rejected it as inadequate and urged the execution of a series of measures proposed by Mr. Nehru in an amendment. Although this amendment was afterward rejected by the Government-controlled Council of State and the Government was not embarrassed by having to consider it formally, it is worth reproducing here as embodying the present aspiration of Indian leaders. The following is quoted from the weekly Calcutta Statesman for September 10:

> This Assembly, while confirming and reiterating the demand contained in the resolution passed by it on February 18, 1924, recommends to the Governor General-in-Council that he be pleased to take immediate steps to move His Majesty's Government to make a declaration in Parliament embodying the following fundamental changes in the present constitutional machinery and administration of India:
> (a) The revenue of India and all property vested in or arising or accruing from property or rights vested in His Majesty under the Government of India Act, 1858, or the present act or received by the Secretary of State-in-Council under any of the said acts shall hereafter vest in the Governor General-in-Council for purposes of the Government of India.
> (b) The Governor General-in-Council shall be responsible to the Indian Legislature, and, subject to such responsibility, shall have power to control expenditure of the revenues of India and make such grants and appropriations of any part of these revenues or of any other property as is at present under the control or disposal of the Secretary of State for India-in-Council save and except the following which shall for a fixed term of years remain under the control of the Secretary of State for India: (1) expenditure on the Military Services up to a fixed limit; (2) expenditure classed as political and foreign; (3) payment of all debts and liabilities hitherto lawfully contracted and incurred by the Secretary of State for India-in-Council on account of the Government of India.
> (c) The Council of the Secretary of State for India shall be abolished, and the position and functions of the Sec-

A STRIKE LEADER

TO BE TRIED FOR A MURDER HE DID NOT COMMIT, AND 12 YEARS AFTER THE STRIKE!

Read the Amazing Facts in the case of Richard Ford, who goes to Trial at Marysville, Cal., on Jan. 4, Before Judge Charles O. Busick

¶ In the Wheatland, Cal., hop-pickers' strike of 1913, four persons were killed in a riot—two officers of the law and two strikers. Ford and Suhr, two strike leaders, were convicted of the murder of one officer in a trial by hysteria.

¶ Neither killed anyone. Neither incited anyone to murder. They were singled out solely as leaders, and held responsible for the violence as leaders. Both were sentenced to life imprisonment!

¶ Ford was paroled last October, and was immediately indicted again for the murder of the other officer. His prosecutor is the son of the man who was killed.

¶ This is essentially a free speech case. Ford was in fact prosecuted, and is now being prosecuted, for his radical views as an I. W. W. and for the exercise of his rights as a leader.

¶ Unless he has the best possible defense he will go back again to years of prison life. His defense is costing $5,000. His lawyers are Austin Lewis, who represented him in the first trial, Gaston M. Ashe, R. W. Henderson and Arthur M. Bundy.

¶ His case is in the hands of the Ford Defense Committee, Lee Tulin, Sec'y, Box 3122, San Francisco.

¶ We appeal to all friends of justice to Ford to contribute what they can. Mrs. Irwin, who is among the signers of this appeal, was an eye-witness of the first trial, in which she says these men were railroaded. A pamphlet, with her vivid account of [illegible] the strike, [illegible] from the American Civil Liberties Union, 100 Fifth Avenue, New York City, which is helping the defense.

retary of State for India shall be assimilated to those of the Secretary of State for self-governing dominions save as otherwise provided in clause (b).

(d) The Indian army shall be nationalized within a reasonably short and definite period of time, and Indians shall be admitted for service in all arms of defense, and for that purpose the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief shall be assisted by a minister responsible to the Assembly.

(e) The central and provincial legislatures shall consist entirely of members elected by constituencies formed on as wide a franchise as possible.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE

(f) The principle of responsibility to the Legislature shall be introduced in all branches of the administration of the Central Government subject to transitional reservation and residuary powers in the Governor-General in respect of the control of military, foreign, and political affairs for a fixed term of years, provided that during the said fixed term the proposal of the Governor General-in-Council for appropriation of any revenue or moneys for military or other expenditure classified as "defense" shall be submitted to the vote of the Legislature but that the Governor General-in-Council shall have power notwithstanding the vote of the Assembly to appropriate up to a fixed maximum any sum he may consider necessary for such expenditure, and, in the event of a war, to authorize such expenditure as may be considered necessary. . . .

All this might seem to be nothing more than parliamentary maneuvering, but such is not the case. The fight is not merely between the Swaraj Party and the Government; it is a struggle between the entire Indian electorate and the Government. Small though the enfranchised fraction of the population is, its voice is, after all, the only voice the country yet has and it must be listened to attentively. In lesser matters, especially in the provinces, the Swaraj Party has last summer and this fall suffered a number of defeats and even experienced internal dissension but on large issues the Nationalists are all agreed under the leadership of the Swarajists.

In the face of the persistence and universality of the Indian cry for immediate, far-reaching constitutional reform the Government may find itself forced to cease looking upon the date 1929 as sacrosanct. Perhaps Mr. Wood, the newly appointed Viceroy, may be able to devise a satisfactory compromise. The change of pilot offers the Government an opportunity to alter its course without losing face. Mr. Wood is unknown in India; he comes out with nothing against him personally. He even has two advantages that no other recent Viceroy has enjoyed. He is the present British Minister of Agriculture, and as such may have acquired experience that will enable him to provide a much desired solution of some of India's most pressing agricultural problems. He was also for many years prominent as president of the English Church Union, from which fact it is deducible that he is a man of strong religious interests. This is antecedently likely to endear him to Hindus, to whom religion is the paramount interest in life, and who, more liberal in this respect than Mohammedans or Christians, admire a man for religious activity, even though it be in behalf of another faith than their own. With a fair degree of political tact, he may be able to pacify the Nationalists, secure them a part of their wishes, and at the same time attain the British end, which is now merely to guide the inevitable transition of India from subject to self-governing state within the empire.
